Rock Chick Lit

Reality Bites Rocker and local legend Juliana Hatfield's career has had its share of highs and lows. In the early '90s, she went from budding starlet to old news faster than you can say Lisa Loeb. In her memoir When I Grow Up, Hatfield discusses the depression and roller coaster ride that's taken her to the top of the charts and back to her indie roots. She performs and signs copies of her work at Barnes & Noble in Kenmore Square on Oct. 30.

Rockie Horoscope { ROCKIE GARDINER }

THAT STINGS

[OCTOBER 23–NOVEMBER 21]
Your featured role as the belle of the ball or the cock of the walk may come to an end now that magnetic and/or adorable Venus has left your sign, leaving you to your own devices. While transiting Scorpio, your macho Mars co-ruler's formidable presence could lead to rougher, tougher encounters, because that's the type of energy you'll be projecting until mid-November. Two years ago, during Mars' last visit, you were advised to have minor surgery, get your teeth fixed and work on building a better body. Do it again.

SAGITTARIUS [November 22–December 21] This isn't a prediction, just an observation. Of the four candidates, Joe Biden is the only one with Sagittarius rising, and therefore the only one with transiting Saturn ascending to his Virgo midheaven. Based on a study of presidential elections that I read many years ago, the Saturn placement is often the key element in determining who makes it to the Executive Office. Even if you're not in competition, an Archer can still be tested by traditions, restraints and pragmatism, or worse, by Saturnian stagnation and disappointment.

CAPRICORN [December 22–January 20] Read for Sagittarius. Since Saturn is your ruling planet (although it won't get to your Libra midheaven until July 2010), it's currently ascending on your solar chart. Thinking about taking over? Plan your campaign accordingly. While you're at it, better read for Virgo, the sign through which Saturn is presently traveling. That should alert you to what might be in store come Election Day, when Saturn forms the first of five oppositions to erratic Uranus. But because the Virgin favors the Goat, the outcome shouldn't be particularly painful.

AQUARIUS [January 21–February 18] The changes may be coming too slowly to suit a politically-savvy Aquarius. However, the entrance of the sun into Scorpio, the sign governing your midheaven, coupled with input from impulsive Mars, suggests that your career could take off faster than expected. Furthermore, as idealistic Neptune in your sign comes out of retrograde motion on Nov. 1, the reversal might provide the wake-up call you've been waiting for. Then there's the do-or-die opposition between restrictive Saturn and your innovative Uranus ruler on Election Day. Wow!

PISCES [February 19–March 19] The start of solar Scorpio on Oct. 22 signals an infusion of water sign energy to which Fish respond well. Especially now that seductive Venus has moved on to fiery Sag, where the goddess may focus on burning bridges you've built in the community and in the workplace. Meanwhile, tradition-bound Saturn in your Virgo partnership house challenges your rebellious spirit when it opposes Uranus in your sign on Election Day. Whether you'll notice if your Neptune ruler is finally facing forward depends on the potency of the Halloween potion.

ARIES [March 20–April 19] Asking a headstrong Ram to be patient a while longer might be an exercise in futility, nevertheless, here goes. If you wait until Mercury, finally moving forward in your Libra partnership house, returns to the point at which it turned retrograde, the Messenger could provide the answer to a question that has been bugging you since autumn began. Can you hold out until Halloween? That's when you're scheduled to receive the final word on an aspect of a close relationship that's still clouded in confusion and contradictions.

TAURUS [April 20–May 20] Now is not the time for "easy come, easy go." Now is when you could find yourself at cross purposes simply because your appreciative and affectionate Venus ruler leaves your Scorpio marriage house for footloose, fancy-free Sagittarius just as the willful sun enters. Need I remind you that militant Mars is transiting Scorpio for the first time in two years, and that His Lordship is usually on the offensive? Lucky for you and a significant other, Mars doesn't dare put you in harm's way until the eve of the Election.

GEMINI [May 21–June 20] No matter what else is going on in your life, do not make light of the pleasures and treasures affectionate Venus may ply you with during its trip through your Sagittarius house of allies. Since this transit lasts only until Nov. 12, better stock up on the good times and warm feelings while they're plentiful. Also be aware that since the end of August your Mercury ruler has been crisscrossing your Libra house of romance and risk, so matters you assumed were settled could pop up again before Mercury exits the Scales on Election Day.

CANCER [June 21–July 22] Impulsive, accident-prone Mars' current trip, through your Scorpio house of entertainment, recreation and risky ventures, can add an element of danger that a normally cautious Crab would avoid like the plague. However, if you find yourself accepting nutty challenges or exerting yourself beyond your customary limits, understand that for the first time in two years, energetic Mars is running the show, as well as your connection to show business. Its whirl through that part of your world ends in mid-November.

LEO [July 23–August 22] Of course, attention must be paid. Right now, it's the Lion's lair and the pride that resides within that's asking for more of your time. Might those creepy Halloween creatures and their delectable creations also be coming to call? Once solar Scorpio begins in earnest, you know from experience that your level of participation increases proportionately. Add the energy that physically fit, tool-friendly Mars contributes while it transits your zone of domesticity, and you may be living in a haunted house sooner than you think.

VIRGO [August 23–September 22] Business as usual, even if it's not what you expected. Changeable Uranus, in your Pisces house of cohorts and competitors, could throw you off your game while it opposes stand-pat Saturn in your sign. Although their polarity doesn't reach perfection until Election Day, you may already be feeling the effects of their tug-of-war. Speaking of which, remember the 1960s? That's the last time that the planets governing innovation and tradition formed such a tight opposition. Their current face off continues until July 2010.

LIBRA [September 23–October 22] One step forward, two steps back, a turnaround and now you're playing catch-up. How long before you regain the position you were in when Mercury went retrograde in your sign on Sept. 24? How about the night before Halloween, when no creature, no matter how fearless, should be stirring the witches' brew? After that, you're in uncharted territory, free to improvise your way through the tricks and treats that follow. Now that your amenable Venus ruler is in jolly, joking Sagittarius, dumb tricks are more probable than treats.

MUSICAL FLAIRS

Steve and Frank Avruch at Opening Night of Symphony

Music Soothes the Savage Stockbroker...

"This brooch? It cost $28," was the quintessentially Boston response to a compliment paid during the cocktail reception at Opening Night of Symphony. Never mind that the rest of the woman's outfit cost as much as a mortgage payment on a mansion in Beverly Hills.

Like the swallows returning to San Juan Capistrano, the blue-bloods, culture vultures and intelligentsia descended on Symphony Hall for a concert helmed by a spry-looking James Levine.

Spotted among the throng: Governor Deval Patrick, gazillionaire playboy and Red Sox owner John Henry, Back Bay doyenne Joan Kennedy, velvet-throated radio warbler Ron della Chiesa, eminence grise Frank Avruch and his newly married son, Steve, yachtsman extraordinaire Ernest Jacquet and the lovely Susan Lutes, hotelier Roger Saunders, and one man who said, "It sounds like that's going to be a wonderful evening," to which the woman he addressed responded, "I know. You won't be there."

Dinner at the Copley Plaza followed the concert, and everyone went home humming a happy tune.

As one guest put it, "This evening made me forget that I lost a third of my net worth in the market today."

Alicia Winn at the MSPCC event at Saks Fifth Avenue

Susan Lutes and Ernest Jacquet at Opening Night of Symphony.

Kids Are Cute, Too...

Even above "Werewolves of London" blaring over the sound system, you could hear the cocktail shakers going full bore, extracting a Pavlovian response from the crowd, when the Massachusetts Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children hosted a cocktail party at the newly refurbished Saks Fifth Avenue.

It was an everyone-who's-anyone kind of affair, with cosmetics and air kisses flying fast and furious.

Present and accounted for: the freshly Out of Africa (and unspeakably beautiful) Mimi Stith, über-hottie Darin Contini and his other half, Sal Malafronte, blonde bombshell Anne Fitzpatrick Cucchiaro, the drool-worthy Alicia Winn, empress of Beacon Hill Smoki Bacon and her royal consort, Dick Concannon, silver fox Pamela Humphrey, and, as one guest observed, "lots of pretty women, prettier boys and 70-year-old moneybags."

Then there was the dim bulb who said, "I wasn't going to come tonight, but I just love dogs."

The MSPCA will be thrilled to hear it.

Beats the Commute...

Because gossip is to parties what gasoline is to an 18-wheeler, I hoped to find out where Jimmy Hoffa's body is buried by attending the 75th anniversary celebration of Teamsters Local 82, held at the South Boston Convention Center.

As far as word on Hoffa's whereabouts is concerned, I came up empty-handed, but I did get to see such worthies as Hizzonah Tom Menino, along with state senator Jack Hart, Local 25 president Sean O'Brien, and others of their ilk.

For some guests, it must have been a bit of a busman's holiday, since a lot of members of Local 82 work at the Convention Center. Then again, as one guest pointed out, if they drank too much and passed out there, at least they'd be at the office in the morning.

We Have a Winner!

A hearty "Mazel Tov!" goes out to Heather Campbell, who correctly guessed that it was Joan Parker's purse that contained Altoids, lipgloss and glasses, while Frances Rivera's held a cellphone, lipgloss, lipstick, keys, cash, a cab voucher and a Saks Fifth Avenue card. Nicely done, Heather. Your Improper Bostonian T-shirt is on its way! ✖✖✖

The Finer Things

My husband and I just spent a week out West. We planned the vacation long before the economy tanked and "$700 billion" became the catchphrase of the day. Money on the mind, we had fun without breaking the bank, bringing library books to the resort pool and eating at restaurant bars.

This issue captures that same spirit of splurging on a shoestring. In "Luxe in the Time of Recession," you'll find 30 indulgences that cost $100 or less. Of course, the best antidote to financial terror is laughter. For a humorous read, turn to "The Great Improper Duck Hunt," about Andrew Rimas and Nick Altschuller's (futile) attempt to shoot a bird and prepare a lavish feast.

We're all for stress relief that doesn't cause economic stress. One final suggestion: Catch a matinee of Nick and Norah's Infinite Playlist. In the movie, cover girl Ari Graynor supplies the year's least luxe scene. Watching Graynor pluck chewing gum from a toilet bowl of puke and pop it in her mouth should make you feel better about your own life.

A Good Egg

ROE, ROE

PERHAPS IT'S the squishiness, but Americans have never embraced caviar with the same gusto they feel for, say, raw yellowfin with wasabi. Richard Brauman, owner of the Little Pearl in Somerville, longs to change that. "My ultimate goal is to produce the world's best caviar," he says. "To make something so exquisite it surpasses everything else that's come before."

It's not a humble ambition, but Brauman, 33, is something of a fish-egg obsessive. As a teen, he spent his free time raising koi goldfish and "thinking about fish tanks, and how to raise a better salmon." Armed with a master's degree in aquaculture, an MBA and a resolute belief in the quality of domestic caviar, he set out to conquer the nation's luxury markets by buying, distributing and producing American fish roe. Besides being fresh, it's also affordable—an ounce of American sturgeon costs $26. Imports can cost hundreds.

"We sell our caviar in the first months after harvest," he says. "Most [imported] caviar that's been sold here is preserved." The canned stuff takes on additional flavors, often turning overly salty and fishy. "Russians say our caviar tastes like what they eat at home."

Brauman can happily rattle off the flavor points of American sturgeon versus rainbow trout, or Missouri paddlefish versus ossetra, but he waxes especially passionate about his sustainable fish farming initiative in Maine. "We're going to grow the fish indoors and bloom the algae and plankton, so the fish get their ideal food source," he says. "The idea is to produce perfect fish."

Drink of the Moment

Blood. Alcohol. Content.

There are many ways to design a cocktail menu. There are happy accidents: When Highland Kitchen bar manager Joe McGuirk inherited flat root beer from a B-Side Lounge in limbo, the House Boat ($7.50)—rum and root beer syrup—was born. There are seasonal concerns: Whiskey turns trendy as bartending parallels fashion and people tuck their light liquors away after Labor Day. Then there's the paramount consideration: Names that sound badass.

"That's how I found out about the drink," says McGuirk, who discovered the Blood and Sand ($7.50) while researching new ideas. "I saw the name, and I saw it had Scotch in it, so I didn't care what it tasted like. I knew I was using it."

The Blood and Sand is a classic drink, which adds to its cool. Less cool is that it's named after a silent 1922 melodrama, but since people are shot and maimed in the finale, it finishes strong. As a cocktail, it's of the rare breed—the Rob Roy, the Rusty Nail—that can keep Scotch sedated. "Scotch is traditionally a hard liquor to work with," McGuirk acknowledges. "We were all surprised at how good it tasted."

The mix of Scotch, Cherry Heering brandy, sweet vermouth and orange juice is a gateway cocktail. With a smoky finish, it's a step in the mixed-drink direction for Scotch purists. "It may be a cocktail for people afraid of Scotch," McGuirk says, seeing the other side of the dynamic. "But people who like cocktails are a fairly adventurous bunch." Blood. Badassery. Adventure. Drink up.

Good Eats

Spoon It On

In tough times like these, you have to savor your indulgences bite by bite. Chef Youji Iwakura, who skippers Ken Oringer's Uni, the posh Eliot Hotel's subterranean sashimi bar, reels in all sorts of shooters, slurps and nibbles for thrill-seekers. None is more decadent than the Uni Spoon ($16). So fresh that it's practically hatching, the spoon holds a quivering trio of a deep ocher quail egg, bubbly, briny uni and glistening Ossetra caviar that's gone in a gulp—but lingers luxuriously on the palate.

Question for Derek Christensen
What are your richest food indulgences?

Derek Christensen is the founder/owner of Revolution Fitness Boston.

1. Molten chocolate cake: Two places I really like it are Orinoco and Sel de la Terre, where they make it with toasted marshmallows.
2. Steak: A plain-old, big 14-ounce filet mignon with extra-crispy hash browns from Smith & Wollensky.
3. Beer: A Sam Adams pulled from Flash's.

Chilean Out

Chilean carmenère burst onto the world wine scene with great fanfare about a decade ago, about the same time as Argentinian malbec. Ever since, it has languished in Never-Never-Land while its neighbor to the east has leap-frogged to superstardom. My recent blind tastings indicate a shift is imminent. Yes, you heard it here first: Chilean carmenère is a more concentrated, intense and flavorful wine today than equivalently-priced malbec. So go out and capitalize on the trend before it happens. Not only are the following all delicious, they're ridiculous bargains.

Morande Terrarum Reserva, Maipo Valley, 2005 ($11, Broadway Marketplace, Cambridge). Fuller bodied with browned meat, bacon and tobacco aromas, this fleshy, softly textured wine is a well-balanced mélange of vanilla, plum and allspice flavors. Round enough for a rare tuna steak, it would also complement grilled chicken rubbed with herbs.

Santa Digna Reserva, Central Valley, 2003 ($13, Gordons, Waltham). This wine is my overall winner in the category, easily worth twice the price. From the clove-accented dark-red berry and chocolate aromas, to the sweet creaminess, you'll definitely want to linger over this one. If carmenère is searching for a direction, Santa Digna is it.

Master of Wine Sandy Block, vice president of beverage operations for Legal Sea Foods

Casillero del Diablo, Rapel Valley, 2007 ($11, Clarendon Wine, Boston). Fragrant with nutmeg, red pepper and cranberry scents, this medium-bodied wine is moderate in style, with super-ripe, lush red fruit and a terrific spicy finish. The perfect foil for recession-era hamburgers.

Terra Noble Reserva, Maule Valley, 2005 ($13, Cambridge Wine & Spirits, Cambridge). This is a chocolatey, fennel-scented carmenère with a nice edge to the succulent black cherry flavors. Think merlot but with a bit more soul. You can enjoy this with boldly seasoned meat dishes, such as barbecued steak tips.

Tablehopping

Please Be Seated

Dining at the city's swankiest joints means breaking out the designer duds and the big bucks. If you've made the effort to look fly and pay top-dollar, your inner VIP deserves the best seat in the house. Here's some prime restaurant real estate. LEAH MENNIES

Clio, table 41: Tucked away in a corner, this banquette table for two overlooks the entire dining room.

L'Espalier, table 5: Also in a corner, this table is flanked by floor-to-ceiling windows on both sides.

O Ya, elbow-shaped corner of the counter: This counter spot provides the perfect perch for watching the sushi chefs craft their masterpieces.

Rialto, table 51: This cozy banquette table has a private feel and a view of the courtyard.

T.W. Food, table 4: With its snug location, the side-by-side style of this table says romance.

Gracious. Sophisticated. Seductive. Distinctive.

MAN TRAP

The truth shall set you free.

YEARS AGO, A GIRLFRIEND gave me a journal. Behind the cover, I taped the only New Yorker cartoon I've ever cut out. A couple sits in a restaurant. The man says, "There's something you need to know about me, Donna. I don't like people knowing things about me." We break up on page seven. I stop writing on 19.

I find it hard to open up. Evidently, I don't even want future Nick to know his current state of mind. Personal questions just make me feel like an animal in a trap. I'd love the freedom of release. But that'd require chewing my foot off, so I just stall and bleed.

I need to be forced into candor, an opportunity that came courtesy of Laura Warrell, a local writer who runs the Man Panel, an alcohol-fueled interrogation of willing guys by dozens of single ladies. Warrell assured, "These are fantastic, attractive women in their 30s and 40s who just haven't had luck in relationships." My immature side pictured cat ladies brandishing glinting sewing needles. My empathetic, nearly-30 side RSVP'd.

Sipping on my third IPA, I considered the difference between candor and vulnerability. Before me sat about 40 women, two reporters and a cameraman. I was prepared to be honest, but this was naked, defenseless, "I-was-in-the-pool!" honesty. Luckily, I had five other men in the foxhole. When the first question was lobbed, we all paused, wondering who would jump on the grenade, "What makes you approach a woman?"

Our eyes glazed, and I could almost hear our collective consciences scream, "Don't say looks!" But to our credit, that truth was acknowledged. The man to my left—who no doubt owned a dog-eared copy of The Game—cited evolutionary biology, which would be his theme for the night. "Who here is sitting hunched with their arms crossed?" he asked. More than a few women raised their hands. "Exactly." I scooted to my right and watched dozens of shining eyes slowly narrow. I'm no body language expert, but those looks could've come with a parental advisory sticker.

As the panel progressed, the discussion—ostensibly for the benefit of the females—became an impetus for self-discovery. I found that my safety net is metaphor. Throughout the night, I turned to lions, amoebas and traffic lights to make my points. "Well, at a bar or something, I consider everyone as a red light. If we lock eyes for a moment, you've changed to a yellow, and if we really lock eyes again, I have permission to advance." I blushed so hard my skin prickled. I don't know if it was because of my answer or the way I phrased it, but at least I was learning.

But were the women? We men provided simple truths. Why do guys hang out in bars? "Because I don't have draft beer at my house," posited a marketing exec. And for the most part, we presented the companionable version of our sex. Whenever our Y-chromosomes threatened to split us apart, the courteous, divorced father of two or the social worker with the godly voice steered us in the right direction.

But what did I offer? Trouble arrived with "What do you think women are looking for?" The suggestion of a sense of humor was met with approval, and my lonely heart soared at the response to my one marketable asset. But when the din died, I realized all I had left to offer was my confusion. A depressing thought when by yourself but oddly comforting in a room full of anxious women.

Collectively our answers were mixed, but with enough beer you could weave them into a lifeline. At the far end of the panel sat my antithesis—a muscled Southern firefighter/boxer/bartender in a mesh hat and tight "wing man" T-shirt. I'm certain that he has stories of eroticism that would make my inner Emily Post choke on her cucumber sandwich. Yet toward the end of the night, he said, "Don't fool yourselves. We're all scared as shit." The women nodded. We nodded. And for a moment, both sexes hovered around the one thing we all recognized as truth. ✖✖✖

WE CAN WORK IT OUT

DEAR HOT GYM GUY:
I hate going to the gym, especially in the mornings before work. I'm not a morning person. However, when I saw you behind the desk on my first day of early morning exercise, I must admit my cranky pants fell right off. I now consider myself a converted early riser who loves arriving at the gym when it's still dark outside. This is, of course, because I enjoy exercising my flirting muscles more than my abdominal ones. So, Hot Gym Guy with the beautiful blue eyes, thank you for giving me the extra push I need to work off that muffin top. Oh yeah, and I wouldn't be opposed to seeing you outside the confines of the gym walls one of these days. Jennifer

To the beautiful, dehydrated blonde jogger in Allston/Brighton on Friday, Sept. 19:
It was extremely erotic watching you as you stood in front of my desk panting from the five-mile run. I offered you some water, and I wanted to ask for your number but thought it may have been inappropriate as you were just there to pick up your car. Was there a moment of attraction as I walked you out? Are you single? I would love to share the view of the Charles with you, and a picnic, as I don't think I could keep up jogging. If that interests you, send me an e-mail with the make, model and color of your car as the title. fjh3910@yahoo.com

It was Sunday night, Sept. 26, and it was pouring rain:
I was exhausted and had just driven for the past five hours. I double-parked near my place on 6th and L Street in Southie to unload my car. I was trying to carry too many things as I was getting out of the front seat, dropping an orange folder of papers on the ground. You were driving toward me in a red car. I bent down to start picking the papers up, and you got out of your car and ran toward me to help me in the pouring rain. When I realized you were there, I looked into your eyes and just said, "Thank you." It was one of those perfect movie moments, but I didn't react fast enough, and maybe I was a little embarrassed. So I just ran to my front door, and you drove off. I would love to get your name, and even buy you a drink. There aren't that many truly nice guys out there anymore, but you're definitely one of them! Send me an e-mail, and I would love to find out more about you! captingigs@aol.com

Going Out

THE STATE OF MAIN

Days before Craigie Street Bistrot closes, chef Tony Maws examines the construction of his new digs. "It's like you're walking into a home; we're cooking for you," Maws explains, standing in front of the storm of metal and wood that will be his massive open kitchen, which embodies the transformation. Prominently displayed, the kitchen sits at the center of Craigie on Main, set to open in mid-November.

"For six-plus years we've been showing people we can do things with a hand tied behind our back and blindfolded, but the team has been working really hard," Maws says, slapping a hand down on the pygmy battleship that is his new custom-made titanium cooking suite. "And this is the Mercedes. This is the reward."

The upgrades continue in the basement with a wine fridge bigger than Craigie Street's entire kitchen and an 11-foot butcher table for breaking down whole animals. "Right now, I set up on the corner of the sink, and another guy puts a cutting board on the freezer," Maws says, before showing off the walk-ins and the water filtration system.

Upstairs, there's a 65-seat dining room that gives more space for grazing locavores, along with a bar, headed by Tom Schlesinger-Guidelli, where Craigie on Main will present its version of pub grub. "We're working on the best burger ever," Maws boasts. "We've been working on it for six months. There's no foie gras, no Kobe, no fluff. It's for people who want a good, beefy burger."

For purists hesitant to lose their fine dining hobbit hole, Maws assures that the spirit remains the same. "If you walk in here and can't tell it's Craigie Street, we did something wrong," he says. "We're not changing. That's why we kept the name. But if people knew about the plumbing I had to deal with over there, they'd have moved, too." NICK ALTSCHULLER

PRIME CUT

Although hipper by the day, Boston can always use a little makeover. Enter the Mandarin Oriental and its salon Mizu. I scoped out the futuristic establishment, co-owned by heir-to-hair-god Elan Sassoon, at the opening party last month. The beautifully simple surroundings, complete with an all-white interior, single-flower vases and arched ceilings, served as the perfect setting for well-dressed partygoers and models, who flaunted renowned stylist Charles Maksou's masterpieces down runway-esque floors. Expect nothing less glamorous to come from your visit. On top of cuts, colors and updos, the salon offers customers high-tech goggles for movie watching and iPods for blocking out blow outs. And Sassoon's Beantown reformation isn't stopping there. Aside from Mizu, he's working on a $22 million dollar academy near Boston University, calling the project "the Harvard of hair schools." AMANDA KNORR

DARK AND BRIGHT

On the death of a child and exuberant folk art

Gone, Baby, Gone

HAPPILY, YOU CAN READ Elizabeth McCracken's memoir of grief over her stillborn baby knowing that she would later give birth to Gus, a living son. But the fateful demise of that first infant sweetly named Pudding may have been the fault of judgment and technology. To the Pudding aftermath, McCracken brings wide skeins of mournfulness, wit, affection and philosophical wonderings about death and the odd persistence of a kind of life. She and her husband, Edward, deeply love someone they never really knew, and that powerful ghostliness haunts, but luckily doesn't darken, their appreciation of Gus. Still, she holds her figurative breath throughout her second pregnancy, aware of its precariousness. The story takes place in France, and a language confusion suggests that "Dwarfs of Grief" (really, nuns) might console them; it's exactly the sort of humorous twist in which this book abounds. Then there's the heart monitor, which "sounded like the forlorn footsteps of a tiny man, walking around a series of corridors, looking for a door." McCracken herself finds many doors opening onto meaning and love, albeit through loss.

Novelist Elizabeth McCracken, formerly of Somerville, writes of loss in An Exact Replica of a Figment of My Imagination.

JUMBLE SALE NOMAD COVERS THE PALETTE

Everything Is Illuminated With Color

NOMAD BRINGS YOU into a rainbow of folk art and fun where the merchandise sparkles with joy. Mexican Day of the Dead skeletons holding guitars rock on, affirming life. Enormous mirrors are textured with silver-colored ornamental metal, and decorative mini-frames surround the face of Frida Kahlo, patron saint of eyebrows. One valuable necklace sports a pendant filled with uncut diamonds, like bits of beautiful broken glass. Boxes are made merry with lustrous paint. And ornately-patterned Moroccan tables, embedded with little wooden bits, are surprisingly affordable. Colorfully embroidered jackets for children could serve just as well as artful wall hangings. Dresses (some expensive) are dreamy and exotic to the point that they seem almost like costumes, with lace and meandering, tinselly decoration. Nomad's shiny oilcloths make for manic tablecloths or cabinet liners, or might even be transformed into durable cosmetics bags. Innocent pleasure imbues everything here, like the bottles that are enlivened with bright beads. It's no wonder that the actual children's T-shirts and wildly roaring stuffed animals share that spirit, too.

Nomad (1741 Mass. Ave., Cambridge, 617-497-6677) features decorative arts, jewelry and clothing from Central and South America, Africa, Asia and the Caribbean.

Caution: Snacking Ahead

As a rural town administrator, Daren "Rex" Rexroad had experience with asphalt, mud and sand. But Rex didn't realize how they—and his grandmother's salty-sweet snack mix called "gravel"—would pave his future. Today, his version of that peanut-pretzel-Chex–white-chocolate bark is joined by dark (asphalt) and milk (mud) chocolate, and peanut butter (sand) varieties, which are bundled in small batches for easy consumption. Perhaps too easy. Rex splashes a caution banner across the bags' backs, but to no avail. James Lionette of the eponymous market warns, "This stuff's just a little easier to quit than cigarettes."

WHEN PUSH COMES TO CHÈVRE...

The greatest honor in cheese

IN THE FOOD WORLD, there are awards—doesn't every Boston restaurant serve an "award-winning" clam chowder?—and then there are AWARDS. As of Nov. 10, Ihsan Gurdal, proprietor of Formaggio Kitchen and cheesemonger extraordinaire, will be decorated with the agricultural version of the French military's Légion d'Honneur, to reward his distinguished contribution to... well, to cheese. More specifically, to the understanding and appreciation of the artisanal French varieties Gurdal annually sources from the Pyrenees and French Alps.

Not many Americans have been recognized as Chevaliers de l'Ordre du Mérite Agricole. As a non-Frenchman, Gurdal won't have his name published in the official "journal," but he will be granted the honor of wearing the red-and-green-striped ribbon that marks him as a recipient of one of France's oldest civil awards. Vive le fromage!

DÉJÀ VU ALL OVER AGAIN: Hey, didn't Max & Dylans Kitchen Bar just open on West Street? Yes, and already there's another Max & Dylans on the way. This one's slated to fill the long-empty space of the former Copia and Meze Estatorio restaurants in Charlestown's City Square. Expect a mid-November opening and, if the owners can make a go of this challenging location, more Max & Dylans to pop up.

THE DOWNSCALE FAST FOOD TAKEOUT window goes upscale with Sportello, which promises to be the latest polished gem from chef Barbara Lynch. Opening before Thanksgiving in Fort Point, Sportello is Lynch's sleeked-up Italianate version of a neighborhood lunch counter. There's also a bakery and retail area offering house-made breads and "pantry staples"—including Christine Ferber's Alsatian jams, renowned for exotic flavors like blueberry preserves with red onion and Xeres vinegar, and green tomato and orange with pain d'épices.

Dining { ERIN BYERS MURRAY WITH JASON SANTOS }

VEGGING OUT

Grezzo's menu does its best to hide the healthy stuff.

MY FASCINATION WITH Facebook comes and goes. Do I really need to know what bands my high-school lab partner currently digs? Obviously not, but one of my excuses to stay addicted has been Jason Santos, chef at Somerville's Gargoyles on the Square. Here's the sort of witty status updates he likes to post: "Jason says knife is very sharp. Keep out of children!" Another time: "Jason wants to know if you have ever imagined a world with no hypothetical situations?"

To borrow an overused phrase, Jason is a genuine "maverick" with signature, spiky blue hair (he admits it might be time to let it go). So, I figured we could have some fun at Grezzo, a raw and vegan restaurant that opened in the North End last spring. Considering we're both Facebook fans of meat products, it would, at the very least, be a learning experience.

Grezzo is a tiny, rust-colored room with six tables and large abstract paintings of fruit on the walls. Within minutes of sitting down, we both felt out of our element. "Is it vegan or just raw?" Jason wondered aloud. On the table, a pamphlet defined it as a "living food restaurant" and listed 40 reasons why we should eat raw. Our server—who managed to disappear several times despite our confined quarters—explained that nothing was cooked at temperatures higher than 112 degrees.

Cocktails were in order, but we had no idea whether the kombucha-based drinks were alcoholic (they weren't). Jason ordered a Grezzo mojito ($10), and I tried the autumn sangria ($12), which was tart and fruity but topped with an impenetrable layer of cranberries.

I CAME, I RAW, I CONQUERED Santos dishes.

Jason claimed to be a master menu writer who locks himself in a room for an entire day every few weeks to revamp his dishes. "It's my favorite thing to do so I don't want any distractions," he said. Could he help me decode the meaning behind oddities like gnocchi carbonara with rawmesan?

"I drive too fast to be vegan," he answered.

We decided to dip in with a winter melon stew ($8). The sweet, silky broth was peppered with Santa Claus melon, mangoes, lavender and slivers of raw coconut (deceptively called "Thai noodles"). Jason described his own version of the noodles involving reverse gelatin—not quite the same technique—but he was impressed nonetheless. The Grezzo sliders ($12) were next: Patties of a vegetable, spice and nut mixture sat on a bed of tomatoes, pickles and avocadoes, served alongside dried, chipped potatoes.

We tackled the faux gnocchi carbonara ($11) to try the "rawmesan." A nutty cream sauce coated the nut-paste dumplings and English peas, with bits of dehydrated eggplant scattered on top. Jason took a bite, carefully scrutinizing it before swallowing. "I'm really trying not to be a meat-eater guy. I mean, I really appreciate what they're doing. But I can't define it," he said, mystified.

Still, we did a noble job of filling up on appetizers before the (massive) entrees arrived. A papaya steak ($21) was a huge lobe of glistening orange fruit carefully etched with pretend grill marks and crusted in star anise. The accompanying marinated cucumber salad added a solid hit of acidic bite to the dish, making it a highlight. The lobster mushrooms over "fettucini" ($24) were spiked with a bite of pickled garlic chips and a pungent saffron sauce. We also split the native tomato ravioli ($21), an artfully arranged plate of sliced tomatoes drizzled with truffle oil and topped with microgreens.

Brownie sundae

Just as soon as we'd started to figure this vegan thing out (microgreens go on everything; dehydrated foods are a staple), it was time for our brownie sundae ($11). The coconut ice cream was addictive, tasting like creamy, iced coconut milk, and the dense brownie could satiate the most powerful chocolate craving. Jason dipped his spoon in again and again. "I can't stop myself," he said with a look of devilish glee. "It's like watching a train wreck."

Walking out, we agreed that Grezzo hadn't made us converts. But Jason said, "I have a lot of respect for what they're doing. And if I was vegan, this restaurant would be awesome." With that, he hopped into his convertible BMW roadster and peeled off down the street. ×××

The Children's Trust Fund's "Voices for Children" gala and auction brought 500 people to the Westin Copley Place Oct. 4. More than $350,000 was raised to benefit 100 Massachusetts child abuse prevention programs. Phil Johnston, former director of Health and Human Services for New England and a founding board member, was the honoree.

The fifth annual "Harvest Moon Gala" fundraiser was held Oct. 24 at the Boston Marriott Cambridge. Some 200 people attended the event, which raised more than $100,000 to support Respond Inc.'s programs serving 4,000 New England women and children affected by domestic violence. The party included dinner, an awards ceremony and an auction.

Ez Sez {EZRA DYER}

PACK LEADER

When dog whispering fails, there's always dog shouting.

SOMETIME OVER THE past couple months, Heather got the notion that we should find a second dog. Her reasoning is that our dog, Manny, needs a companion, which seems to insinuate that my own companionship leaves something to be desired. As Heather looked at Petfinder every night, showing me dogs looking for foster homes, I played it cool, because there's no downside to taking a detached attitude. If I act like I don't want another dog, and the second dog turns out to be great, my reservations will be quickly forgotten. But if the new dog sucks, I have a massive I Told You So in my back pocket, one that can hopefully be redeemed next summer when I impulsively buy a boat on eBay. Again.

Speaking of dogs, I'd like to take this opportunity to point out to my Facebook friends that I'm not "Manny Dyer." I don't, as a general rule, anthropomorphize animals, so I assumed that when people saw Manny writing on his wall and referring to Heather as "mommy" that they knew I wasn't the author. And in fact, Manny's proxy left obvious hints as to his identity, including numerous posts on my wall. But after talking to a few people with whom "Manny" corresponded, I learned that everyone just assumed I'd suddenly become the sort of guy who calls his wife mommy while pretending to be a dog who's on the Internet. Frankly, I'm a little disturbed at the ease with which people reached that conclusion. Sure, I might have Manny wear sunglasses and then grab his mouth to make him say, "Hey, got any weed?" but that's only when I'm drunk.

Anyway, back to Dog Number Two. One day Heather's looking at Petfinder, the next we're heading to New Hampshire to meet a Labs4Rescue transport truck that's arriving with a 10-month-old female mix named Shady. Why "Shady"? Because she likes to lounge in the shade. And possibly listen to Eminem. But, yes, most of the dogs up for adoption have names that seem like they've been picked randomly from a dictionary, or by Gwyneth Paltrow. Shady might not be the greatest name, but at least it's better than BB King, Pepsi, Mr. Mo or Budweiser—all dogs on the Petfinder site right now.

We load Shady into a crate, and she's mellow on the ride home, ignoring Manny sitting next to her and accepting the occasional biscuit. So it's a bit of a surprise when we let them out of the car and into the yard. I expect them to begin frolicking happily, but that's not quite how things unfold. The melee that ensues is so quick and ferocious I imagine Michael Vick's friends showing up and placing bets. And personally, I wouldn't lay money on either one. Manny is 75 pounds and has the experience, but Shady is 45 pounds and absolutely ripped. She looks like a cross between a black lab and Seabiscuit.

Dog fights always test my macho fortitude, because, on the one hand, I'd love to stop the fight before anyone gets hurt. But, on the other hand, I value having an other hand. And I'm loath to insert it into a frothing mess of snapping canine jaws. I already have a scar on my shin from when I pulled a homicidal husky off Manny, and she stepped back and bit right through my jeans. You know what they say: Once bitten, let Heather deal with it the next time. And I've got to say, Heather was very courageous out there. She's a tough little lady, and she's got the skinned knee to prove it.

So now we've got an issue. We have two dogs who can't be in the same room together, yet must coexist under the same roof. The next few days are tedious, to say the least. I let one dog out, while the other one howls from behind a closed door. I feed them independently. Walks take twice as long. On the upside, my case for a new boat is getting stronger.

I've watched enough Dog Whisperer to know that this might not be an intractable situation, but Cesar Millan says that he rehabilitates dogs and trains humans.

Think that's funny? Send unbiased e-mails to ezra@improper.com.

Problem is, I'm the only human around the house most of the time, and I'm pretty sure that I'm not the one who needs training. I don't attack Manny or try to escape or knock things over with the constantly flailing mace that's my tail. I'm not easily distracted by outside stimul—Hey! Look over there! Is that TV on? Whoa, I've gotta go check that out. Hold on... OK, it was just an ad for OxiClean. Know what? Here's what this column would look like if it were written by the guy from the OxiClean ads: I HAVE A BEARD, AND I SHOUT A LOT! I'M HARD OF HEARING, AND I DON'T LIKE TO

I expect them to begin frolicking happily, but that's not quite how things unfold.

SHAVE! WHAT?! So anyway, Shady has a hard time focusing.

Eventually, I can't take the standoff any more, so I decide to try to work a little Dog Whisperer magic and get Shady and Manny to hang out. Shady, I reason, was scared after her traumatic truck ride from Tennessee, and if Millan has taught me anything, it's that scared dogs are aggressive dogs. Also, if you want people to shut up, you should act like you're biting them with your hand while making a sudden "Psst!" noise. Try it. It works.

I set up a pet gate and slowly open the door between the basement and kitchen. Shady is downstairs, Manny upstairs. She immediately lunges at the gate, flipping out. He takes a step back but soon grows indifferent, while she remains obsessed with getting closer. Which I slowly allow, over the course of the next few days, until, with great trepidation, the pet gate is removed. Shady and Manny look at each other for a moment, and immediately begin... playing. I dog-whispered the hell out of this situation.

Now they're best friends, and Shady has proven herself a very sweet and affectionate dog who was actually just freaked out by her drastic transition. The thing is, we weren't adopting her—we were fostering her. She's getting adopted by the parents of one of Heather's high-school friends. So next week, she's gone. To a good home, but gone nonetheless. But I've got a feeling that we're going to become a two-dog household again sooner rather than later. Now that I've revealed my powers, there's no excuse not to get another dog, because no matter how temperamental it is, I will cure it with my powerful pet-gate technique and master-of-the-pack aura. So, as Heather surfs through the listings on Petfinder, I'll be adjusting my search criteria on eBay. Because with two dogs, we're definitely gonna need a bigger boat. ×××

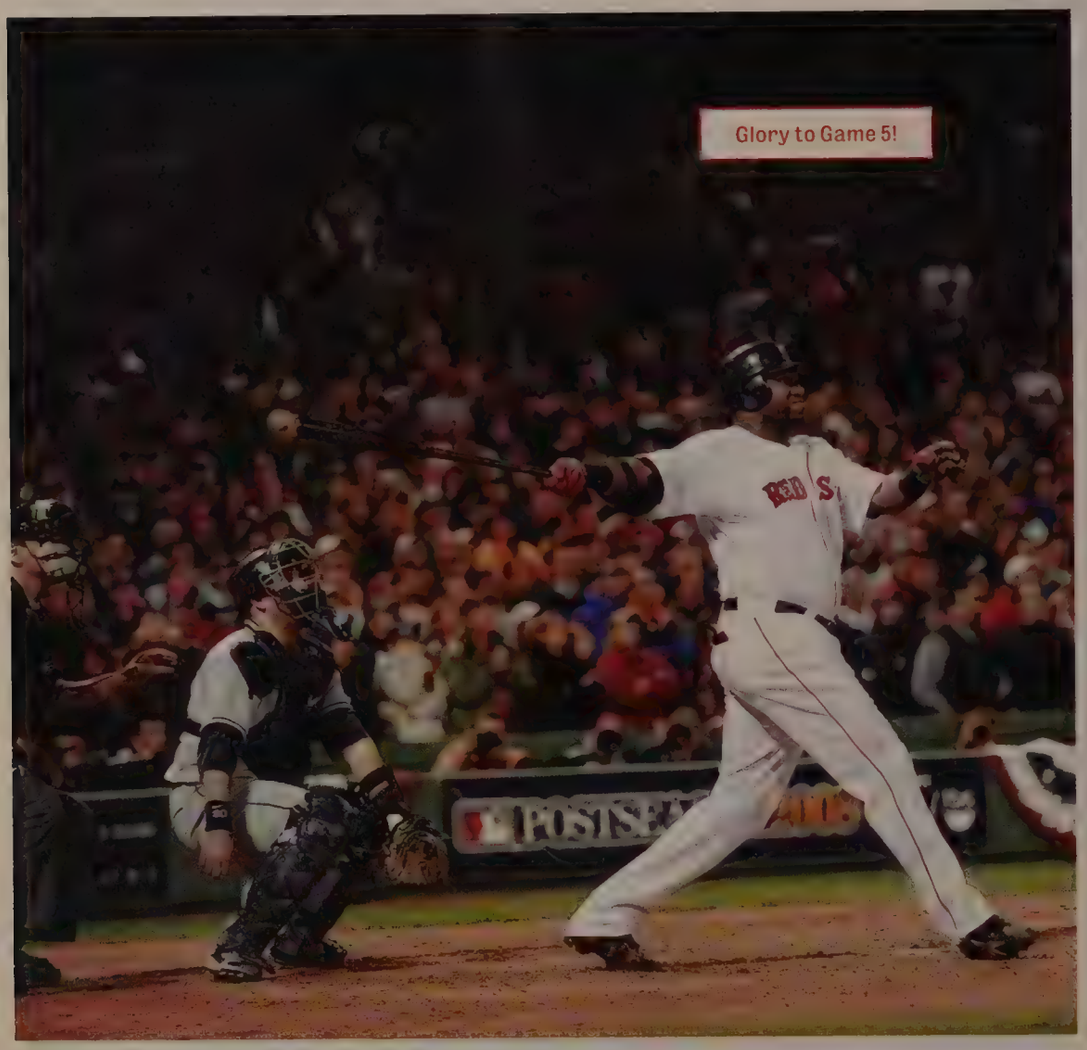
FIVE ALIVE

Despite the loss, we'll always have that comebark.



THE PARTY was just winding down inside Tropicana Field but just starting to pick up steam on the streets of St. Petersburg. I was still inside walking across the field a couple hours after Game 7 of the ALCS finished, when a local videographer yelled over to me, "Hey, CC! I can't believe we cover losers now!"

We both knew that comment was in jest. He was referring to the heartbreak experienced last Super Sunday and, of course, the seven-game heartbreak we'd just endured at the hands of the Rays. But while the Tampa Bay players were making a pig pile next to the mound at the Trop, I felt far more levelheaded about everything that had happened. Mostly, because I felt like—unlike at the Super Bowl—the better team had won.

It was a trying year for the Sox, primarily because the bar is set so high. It's World Series or bust. They've become victims of their own success. Long gone are the days when they do everything humanly possible to screw up in October. Miracles are the standard; Duck Boats are the expectation.

We now know the Red Sox will not become the first team to repeat since the 1999–2000 Yankees run, but damn, they made a fun go of it. Personally, I want to thank the team for Game 5 at Fenway Park. That comeback hit me like a Mack Truck. I was preparing my season-ending monologue on NECN. They were seven down, with seven outs to go. Of course it was over! I still can't believe it.

Game 5 at Fenway was an odd day. I'd never seen a playoff match at the old ball yard with such little energy surrounding it. The fans arrived late. They arrived bored. My main man, the Sausage King, said it best: "These people are dead."

It wasn't so long ago that tickets on the street for an ALCS game were moving for thousands of dollars above face value. But on this night, amazingly, so many tickets were selling at a discount that a scalper told me he had 50 in his pocket and nobody wanted them.

The fans had already quit. They had given up. Many of them left early, grumbling about how they should have avoided the disaster. Those that did stick around weren't happy, and they let the Dead Sox know it. I heard one guy yell, "I should have stayed home!"

But then, David Ortiz hit the homer. It was the seventh inning—7-4, Rays. Could the Sox come back? "No friggin' way," I said. Proving me wrong, JD Drew slammed a two-run homer in the eighth, and Fenway morphed back into the greatest park in the world. Next, Coco Crisp had the best at-bat of his life, knocking in Mark Kotsay. It was tied, 7-7. Drew finished the job in the ninth, slamming a ball over right-fielder Gabe Gross, scoring Kevin Youkilis from second base, and the Red Sox won, 8-7.

We've seen many dramatic walk-off wins over the last decade at Fenway, but this one took the cake. Seven runs with seven outs to go? I couldn't sleep that night. Youkilis said it best: "When we are old maybe we will be able to sit around and talk about some of these games with our kids. We are so spoiled. All of us."

But in the end, as impressive as Game 5 was, it wasn't enough. The holes in the Red Sox lineup were exposed in Game 7. Youth beat experience. To this day, I still don't know how or why the Rays didn't fold like an accordion. I thought it was over after Game 5.

At another time, the end would have been hard to take. But the better team won. And no matter what happened, I'll never forget Game 5 at Fenway Park. ✖✖✖

ON FAULK, FAVRE AND THE RETURN OF THE CHAMPS

5 THINGS WE LOVE ABOUT CELTICS SEASON

The new Paul Pierce... A lot of great athletes pass through this city, but rarely do fans get the chance to develop an emotional connection with a superstar that goes beyond wins and losses. Paul Pierce has always been an exception. He's only been here for 10 years, but over that time he's matured about 20. Celtics fans understood the origin of every one of those tears.

More Rondo please... Despite the greatness that surrounds him, Rajon Rondo is easily the most entertaining guy in green. Why? Because every time you watch him, there's a good chance you'll see something new. Rondo's unlike any point guard who's preceded him—he's like a snowflake (which would be a great nickname if it weren't already reserved for Scal).

Garden house party... At the end of last season, Eddie House's oldest son hit the big time as the Celtics' unofficial ball boy. This year, Eddie's two younger boys—a pair of twin dancing machines—are ready for the spotlight. By mid-November, they'll be Jumbotron legends—on par with Soulja Boy kid and Jack Black-out.

There's no "I" in Ubuntu... Team chemistry is part of what makes the Celtics so fun to support—and obviously a reason for their success. Conversely, Wally Szczerbiak hit the deck on opening night and not one teammate helped him off the ground. It didn't help that KG had a sneaker clamped down on his throat.

Sweet Ray... Watching Ray Allen play basketball is like watching Charlie Kaufman write a screenplay, or Jamie Lynn Spears get pregnant—it's a natural chain of events. You see Allen on the floor, and know that he was born to play basketball. He's so graceful that some countries use footage of him running down the court to rock their crying babies to sleep.

2 NEW CELTICS NICKNAMES

Big Baby Davis and Leon Powe are... bop and Rocksteady of Teenage Mutant Ninja Turtle fame. Not sure why they scream TMNT, but try thinking of Kevin Garnett as Shredder and it starts to make a little more sense. Also, for aesthetics, Sam Cassell plays the role of Krang.

Tony Allen is... the Human Roller Coaster. He'll take you up, he'll take you down, and on certain days, he'll make you scream like your hair's on fire. Regardless of what Tony brings to the table, it's about as calm and collected as Gilbert Gottfried.

3 DATES TO WATCH

11/9 The Celtics travel to Detroit for an Eastern Conference Finals rematch. Truthfully, we have a little trouble getting into this rivalry, thanks to the Pistons' general apathy toward... well, pretty much everything. Win or lose, count on Chauncey Billups and Richard Hamilton to look like they just walked out of colonoscopies.

11/13 The Pats host the Jets for a Thursday night, AFC East showdown. Vince Wilfork's delivered some serious cheap shots in his day, but ending Brett Favre's consecutive-start streak is his white whale. Something to keep an eye on...

11/18 The Celtics beat down on the Knicks, although this year Isiah Thomas will be fast asleep at home, instead of just napping on the bench... Too soon?

ONE VIEW FROM THE BRIGHT SIDE

So we lost the ALCS, but imagine the insanity at WEEI if we'd been entangled in that Weathergate mess! Pete Sheppard's head would be in pieces, Dale Arnold might've lost his temper and called Bud Selig a "gosh darned jerk" on air and D & C... eh, they'd be too busy trying to link Obama to terrorists.

4 Pats Raps

High on Faulk... When you're putting together the list of definitive dynasty-era Patriots, Kevin Faulk isn't the first guy who comes to mind. Or the second... or maybe even the fifth. But since 2001, no one's been more reliable, and we dare you to name a guy—other than Brady and Vinatieri—who's come through more with the game on the line.

Safety dance... They've got some ways to go, but we could get used to this James Sanders/Brandon Meriweather safety combination. They both love to hit, have a decent set of hands and rock the kind of swagger that'd make MIA proud. Plus, you know they've spent the last couple years learning from the best.

Cassel Watch... So where do we think Matt Cassel's playing next year? Up in Minnesota? Does he get a shot in Tampa? What about the 49ers? Because if we've learned one thing this season, it's that Cassel is a legitimate NFL quarterback—and he'll get paid like one this summer. If we've learned two things, the second is that Larry Johnson has serious game with the ladies.

Bust a move... There's a lot of debate in Boston about whether—after only three seasons—it's too early to call Laurence Maroney a bust. We say yes, but raise you this: What about Ben Watson? It's not that he's been awful, but we had pretty big plans for No. 84. He's only 27, so it's not too late, but we're running out of patience, and he's short on excuses.

Soroff On ARI GRAYNOR

The Nick and Norah's Infinite Playlist actress dishes on playing drunk, The Sopranos and Michael Cera.

NEWTON-BORN ACTRESS Ari (short for Ariel) Graynor was raised in Wellesley, performing at a young age with such local groups as Boston Children's Theatre, the SpeakEasy Stage Company and Wheelock Family Theatre. Her breakthrough role came as Meadow's roommate on The Sopranos. Graynor attended Trinity College but left to do her first Broadway play, Brooklyn Boy, which garnered her a 2005 Clarence Derwent Award. She also appeared in The Little Dog Laughed, a 2007 Tony nominee. On TV, she has been in Law & Order: SVU, Veronica Mars, CSI: Miami and Numb3rs, while her film credits include Mystic River, For Your Consideration and An American Crime. Graynor, 25, currently stars as party girl Caroline in Nick and Norah's Infinite Playlist, opposite Michael Cera and Kat Dennings. She lives in New York City and can next be seen in Youth in Revolt, out Feb. 20.

Jonathan Soroff: Were you named after the Little Mermaid?
Ari Graynor: No. I predate The Little Mermaid, but, of course, I got that all the time growing up.

What do your parents think of your star turn as a party girl?
They love it. I never went through a horrible rebellious phase, so I think they're comfortable knowing that, while I had fun in high school and college, I never got into any serious trouble.

Are you a party girl?
No. I mean, I've had my nights as that character, but I've also had my nights of taking care of friends and I was never totally out of control. I will say that Trinity College definitely helped me prepare for this role.

You star in the gross-out scene of the year. Ever worry that's how you'll be remembered?
I don't think anyone wants to be remembered for sticking their hand in a vomit-filled toilet and fishing out chewing gum, but I've had 20 years of work before this, and hopefully I'll have 60 years of work ahead of me that will cancel that out as my defining moment.

Ever gone into a gas station bathroom barefoot?
Absolutely not. No way. You would need to pay me money to do that.

Britney Spears did it. Think she'd fish her gum out of a public toilet after vomiting in it?
I wouldn't put it past anybody if they were in that state. Even the best of us could do something that disgusting.

PHOTOGRAPH BY Nick Onken/Lamoine Photo Group

Drunkest you've ever been?
There was a Blink-182 concert at Suffolk Downs in 2001 that comes to mind.

Given the role of Caroline, do you think you're the actor to play Amy Winehouse in the biopic?
Sure. She's a talented lady. I'm sure she has a great story. But I'm hoping to not play the drunk-mess party girl again for quite some time.

What do they use in films to simulate vomit?
They created a mixture of ginger ale and smooshed-up ginger snaps that I'd have to take a swig of and then hold in my mouth 'til they said, "Action!"

Michael Cera: sexy or not?
He's just one of the best guys ever. An absolute sweetheart.

In real life, do you laugh at farts?
[Laughs.] I have to say, I'm not the biggest bathroom humor girl. That said, everyone giggles at the inappropriate fart, but I prefer humor that's situational or involves personalities. I'm less about a joke and a setup than I am about behavioral humor.

Do you like your looks?
I do now, I guess. I was made fun of really badly for being fat when I was a kid and in middle school, so I feel like I'll always have [a] fat-kid complex, but as I get into my mid-20s, I'm relaxing a bit on the self-hatred.

Are you a real blonde?
Ish. A dark, dirty blonde, although it's been a long time since I've seen my real color, so that's just sort of a guess.

Best thing you got for your bat mitzvah?
Money. I really don't think at 13 that anything beats cash. You either get cash or a book about Judaism or a lot of repeat Tiffany bracelets.

Online, I saw you referred to as a young Tatum O'Neal...
I also saw myself referred to as a young Debbie Gibson.

Me, too, which is funny because Tatum O'Neal was a child star and Debbie Gibson was a teen pop sensation. Which is more insulting?
I could be called worse, I guess. The Debbie Gibson one is funny because people say I give off an '80s vibe. But Tatum O'Neal is pretty.

A bit troubled, though, no?
Yeah, but they're both fine comparisons. I'm not elated with either, but they're both attractive. When I was younger, I got a lot of Mayam Bialik, the actress who played Blossom. You gotta love that. I think the last I heard of her, she was head of a Yiddish a cappella singing group.

Was The Sopranos the Shakespeare of the 21st century?
I don't know if anyone can compete with the Bard, but as far as I'm concerned that was definitely the finest show on TV and better than most movies out there.

An American Crime*—was that a shamefully overlooked film?*
I think some of the performances were. It was a great lesson in expectation, because at the time, I thought, "OK, this is it. This is the role that'll make my career that much easier." It had such an amazing cast and Sundance buzz, and then it just kind of fizzled. At the time, I was really disappointed.

Was working with Clint Eastwood on Mystic River like working with God?
I was so worried about screwing anything up on that set, I just stayed motionless all day. At the time, I was so intimidated and nervous. I'd never been on a film set before. I'd love to work with him again so I could pay more attention to what he was doing and learn from him. I was too scared at the time.

Last question: Top three things on your iPod?

Time the Time of Recession

By NANCY GAINES

Photographs by JONATHAN BELLER

Diversions that don't break the bank

Living large without spending big has always been its own reward. But like love during cholera, luxe in the time of recession is more than a gratifying diversion. It's a welcome escape. Indeed, perilous days like these call for creative intervention, even if you find your standard of living slipping only a notch or two. Here then is a make-a-wish list of amusements to soothe the decadently deprived, in increments from measly shoestring ($10) to modest budget ($100). Mixing playful, practical and worthy activities, this guide holds treats for the brain, body and spirit. Remember, our glasses are never half empty when they're half full of bubbly. So let's raise them and toast the high life. It's still surprisingly affordable.

Because taxes aren't always applicable and tips are voluntary (although strongly recommended), the price list doesn't include either. And in some cases, we've rounded up or down a dollar or two.

The Great Improper Duck Hunt

Two inept magazine editors try to shoot a bird and cook it.

by Nick Altschuller & Andrew Rimas

Photographs by Garth McElroy & Kelly Davidson

NOW IS THE WINTER of our unpaid rent. Ever since Wall Street crashed, knocked out its front teeth and plummeted down an open manhole, we've all become wary of splendor. Along with the smell of stockbroker sweat, there's scrimping in the air. It's a time when most people are thinking twice about buying things like insulin, so it's hard to justify the cash for a $40 plate of fork-tender Muscovy duck with chanterelles.

But surely, we say, spitting out our Spam frite avec pain de Wonder, there's some way a gourmand can still eat foie gras without having to sell his liver on eBay? This economy won't doom us to hot dogs, tuna surprise and Cheez Whiz, will it? We're Americans, after all. We're better than that.

So Improper editors Nick Altschuller and Andrew Rimas decided to drive up to Maine and go duck hunting. They would harvest nature's bounty by shooting it in the face and roasting it in a delicate l'orange sauce with a touch of bergamot. They would damn the naysayers, the accountants and the fools who said, "Why don't you just buy a duck for $14 at Shaw's instead of spending $100 on a car rental and $50 on gas, not to mention all the hunting gear and beer?" They would prove that real men—men with absolutely no knowledge of gun safety—can't be held back by the economy, or even by logic. Besides, harvesting ducks isn't allowed in the Public Garden.

This is an account of Yankee self-reliance, a story in the tradition of The Leatherstocking Tales, of Hemingway and of Fudd. It's about the primeval New England woods and the hunters who test their mettle by sitting in them. But mostly it's a story about ducks.

Duck. Duck?

Nick: There's no time more dichotomous than 4 am. You're either a couple blinks away from sleeping 'til lunch or embarking on a day so full it's like cashing in a two-for-one special. My buddy Andrew Wilkie has been with me at many of these moments, handing me another unneeded beer, or in this case, shells for a camouflaged 12-gauge. What are friends for?

Wilkie has always been my go-to outdoorsman, and over the years I've been his enthusiastic rube. He brings me extra gear for hikes, untangles my fishing line and patiently corrects all my misassumptions. In many ways, he's the George to my Lennie. I love nature. I just can't be trusted around it.

Thoroughly experienced at leading idiots through the woods, Wilkie founded Water's Edge Guide Service in 2007, and because I trained him through years of diligent bumbling, he doesn't charge me. So we find ourselves walking onto a threshed Maine cornfield at 5 am, and immediately, I display my invaluable ineptitude.

The anxiety of hunting is like approaching someone in a bar. Will I succeed? Will I fail in front of my friends? Will I shoot myself in the foot?

Apparently you need to disguise duck blinds. We've hiked in with portable ones—big backpacks that turn into a beach-chair–sleeping-bag hybrid. The material is already camouflaged, but I guess birds are smarter than you'd think. Grab some stale bread and a Taser, and you'd quickly have your limit of the city variety, but hunting wild duck requires that you conceal your blind, weaving corn stalks and saw grass through the exterior loops. We harvest decor to the light of our headlamps and the orange glow of a complex of greenhouses that nearby tomato farmers built. After 20 minutes, we have a line of camouflaged coffins, dressed like funeral pyres, which we climb into with loaded shotguns.

Waiting to shoot is an odd and peaceful feeling. Hunkered down in absolute stillness, your chest roils with adrenaline while only your eyes ping-pong across the horizon. With a cut and muddy finger, I fiddle with my trigger guard while images of the action films of my youth come to mind—the eyes of mud-caked Schwarzenegger lying in wait for the Predator. Yet the clammy-palmed anticipation, the high-strung tension seems disconnected from that kind of machismo. The anxiety of hunting is more like approaching someone in a bar. Will I succeed? Will I fail in front of my friends? Will I shoot myself in the foot?

As the greenhouse glow slowly gives way to sunlight, and color begins to saturate the silhouettes of the trees, my nerves melt, and hunting approaches Zen. Perhaps a little too much Zen, because by 6:30, Andrew is dozing. In my own waking dream, I'm hearing far-off quacks in my head, a psychological taunt only punctuated by the quiet war stories shared between Wilkie and avian photographer/hunting partner Garth McElroy.

"I had my limit in about 10 minutes the other day," McElroy whispers, voicing his frustration and agitating my blood lust. It seems the gorgeous fall morning unfolding has screwed our murderous intentions with nary an avian peep. "On a cloudy day, with a little bit of rain, it'd just be a totally different world," Wilkie explains. "The ducks fly lower. They fly more, and they're less hesitant to land in places." With the sun illuminating the glory of Maine, what we've got is leaf-peeping weather, which isn't the kind of luxury I desire. I want to kill a bird. Maybe tear out the feathers and make a lovely throw pillow.

In the distance, groups of black ducks, ring-necks and mergansers fly toward farms or the Kennebec River. Cackling just out of range, the only murder going on here is the crows. Restless, warming in the blinds and resigned to failure, the four of us pack up and cross the field, hoping for luck with the bigger, fatter meat targets of Canadian geese.

Goose.

Andrew: The feathered devils have outwitted us. I climb out of my coffin, blinking away the stupor that comes from lying heavily armed in a wet cornfield for two hours. Ordinarily, I'd be pushing into the scrum on the D Line train about now, so despite the perfidious ducks, I feel good, even jaunty. We drag our blinds, clumps of rice grass trailing through the mud, about 200 yards to the west. According to our guides, this end of the cornfield is a sort of goose ghetto, a place where huge gangs of flopping roasters hurl themselves into the sights of every passing gun. All I see is a shiftless-looking crow.

The sky is a pristine robin's egg blue, as if Martha Stewart were God. There's not even a brush of cloud above the fiery maples, birches, aspens, poplars and oaks that ring the field, so the red and gold leaves slice hard into the cool sky. This is nature at its gaudiest, New England–as-Vegas-showgirl, and while it's excellent for postcard manufacturers, the birds don't like it. Ducks and geese possess an understated taste in weather. They're natural Burberry customers.

According to our guides, this is a sort of goose ghetto, a place where huge gangs of flopping roasters hurl themselves into the sights of every gun. All I see is a shiftless-looking crow.

We set up our blinds in a shallow semicircle. Then Wilkie plants life-sized plastic decoys of Canadian geese in a loose V-formation around our zone of fire. They're wonderfully realistic and would make a lawn flamingo blush with envy. I'm tempted to shoot them. Instead, Wilkie sends Nick and me out to drop broken corn cobs around the plastic birds, trying to create the impression of an avian rest stop. We trample around for a few minutes, kicking through mud and severed corn stalks before we lie back down in our blinds. Wilkie tells us that geese are less cunning than ducks, so we leave our flaps open and eat ham sandwiches while waiting for the foie gras to land.

Our guides fall into a spirited discussion about dam adjustments on the Kennebec, and the air smells as wholesome as a bran muffin. After a few minutes, I relax my hold on the gun and nap, listening to the ruffling wind. It occurs to me that the serenity could only be improved by a moment of contrast: for example, by the sudden descent of a dozen juicy, waddling Canadians, followed by a battery of fruitful shotgun blasts. But this doesn't happen.

"It's not like we're getting hosed on birds flying by," Wilkie says. "We're just not even seeing anything."

"It was a honey hole last week," McElroy adds.

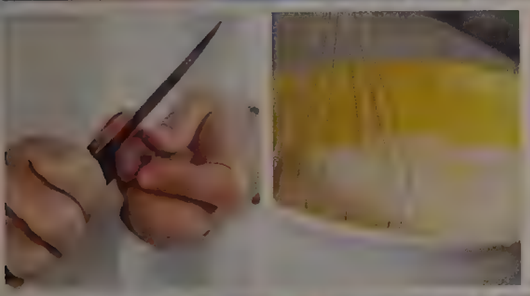
The hours drift past, and we don't spot anything more enticing than a pair of distant ring-necks. At one point, a hunter creeps into view along the edge of the cornfield, but he's inedible. My note-taking lapses into doggerel:

Impotent droop our unfired guns. For shame.
While distant flies the mocking, ring-neck duck.
Bright sun and wilting manhood take the blame.
Dick Cheney, even, had much better luck.

At 10 am, Wilkie gives the order to pack up. "It's not unusual, even on a mediocre morning, to see 10 or 15 flocks," he says unhelpfully. On the walk of shame back to the truck, he falls in step with the intruding hunter, and his accent slips about three centuries deeper into backwoods Maine. They trade non-rhotic pleasantries ("You've got some nice blinds theah, a-yuh." "A-yuh.") as we squish through the furrows, sweating under our packs.

After the Mainer toddles off to exercise his Second Amendment rights somewhere else, Wilkie drives us home. As a parting gift, he rummages through his freezer and hands Nick a couple of bags of what appear to be iced viscera, but are in fact the breasts of a mallard he shot two weeks ago. To this he adds a bowling ball–sized item that turns out to be an entire Canadian goose. It's not the trophy we wanted, but as a consolation prize, it'll do.

Now we have to cook it.



Fair Is Fowl

Prostrate on wax paper, the mallard breasts are deep purple and viscid, like four palm-sized hearts. Finally faced with meat, I can't take my hands off it—plucking at stray feathers, reenacting The Temple of Doom and pressing bloody thumbprints to the white pages of my recipe.

Hoping to combine heavy French grandeur with a genteel English air, I prepare the duck with a sauce of orange and Earl Grey tea. Easy enough to make, I sear the mallard and sauté shallots in the pan. After adding OJ, broth and five bags of tea leaves, we sit around and drink beer until the mixture has reduced, then strain it and add honey and butter. The result is a tawny, flecked liquid, a gourmet swamp water, which I find appropriate and Andrew finds lacking.

The mallard itself, though less involved, is considerably more difficult. When duck meat looks like beef, it's hard for two novices to known when it's done. So we don't aim for a nice sear with a subtle pink center, instead shooting for edible. It's the only target we hit all week. Despite our six-pack-and-guesswork approach to cookery, the duck comes out in tender slabs with a noticeably wild flavor.

In our defeated truck ride home, Wilkie had told us that "puddle ducks are filter feeders, so they're eating algae, but they [also] eat corn and wild rice." At this moment, I can taste that diet. When a sommelier, mixologist, barista or someone else in fancy pants regales me with flavor notes, I mostly just swallow and nod. But Wilkie's description is exactly right. The nuances are discernable, and instead of learning the tasting points from someone in a tie or apron, I got them from a man who has seen me vomit. Perhaps our results aren't luxurious, but sitting down to a feast with Andrew and tipping back another glass of his wine, I'm sustained.

And Fowl Is... Foul

Along with vodka hangovers, roast goose is one of my family's Christmas traditions. Sometimes I've driven to four or five different butchers to find a white, plump animal, so I'm alarmed by the weird purple thing that emerges like an alien fetus from Wilkie's freezer bag. It's mottled with stray quills, and its aroma isn't so much gamey as reeking of pond scum. We slam the bird into the oven and get to work on a maitake and baby bello Port sauce, but our expectations are suddenly very low.

An hour and 15 minutes later, I stick a meat thermometer in the breast and am rewarded with a brisk jet of blood. Forty-five minutes pass and the thermometer is still shy, but now the meat saws off like unvarnished teak. Even masked with sauce, the goose has the texture of high-quality furniture, while its flavor flirts with old fish before settling into the merely amphibian.

"Maybe the leg is better," Nick ventures. It's not. The only person who can stomach more than a few bites of the fungal horror is my three-year-old daughter, but she eats things she picks out of the sandbox, so that doesn't prove anything. Without any ceremony, I dump the carcass in the trash.

As we start the long, humid drudgery of tidying up the kitchen, I discover that we still have most of a bottle of leftover Port. A toast to the hunters, I say, filling two snifters to the top with ruby—one might say blood-hued—wine.

It occurs to me that muzzle-loading deer-hunt season is coming up. Venison, anyone? ×××

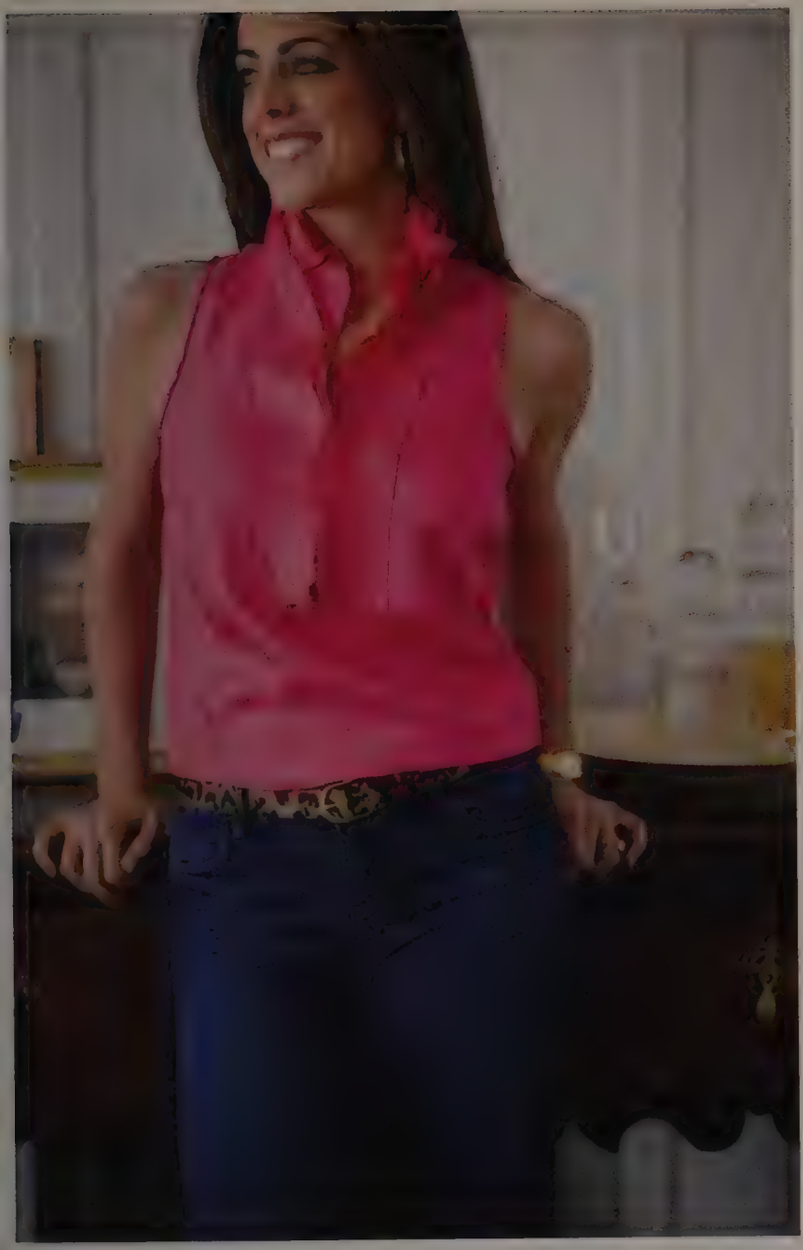
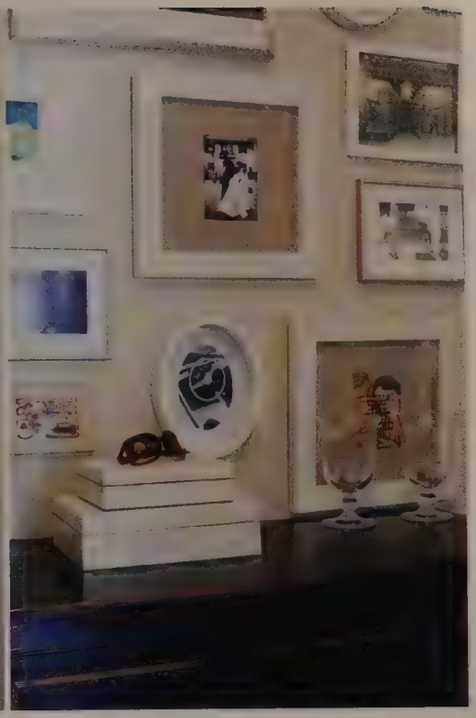
Interior stylist Erin Gates shows us how to beautify a room or a wardrobe on a budget.

By Amanda Knorr
Photographs by Michael Piazza



FOR HALLOWEEN, Element Interiors owner Erin Gates dressed up as over-the-top celebrity stylist Rachel Zoe. Gates pulled out her fur capelet, long gold chains and supersized sunglasses, morphing into the perfect parody of luxury. True, the 29-year-old does own these items, but it's not what you think. The mink? A hand-me-down from her grandmother. The necklaces? A dollar at an antique shop. The Jackie O shades? Target. So the joke's on you, Zoe-types. You don't need an Amex Black Card to live the luxe life. Gates is proof that creativity, wise purchasing and leaving your ego in the parking lot are the secrets to glamour.



Improper Bostonian: What are your favorite clothing shops in Boston?
Erin Gates: I like to shop at a variety of stores, from chains to locally-owned shops, to mix up my look so that it doesn't appear that everything came from the same place. Saks Fifth Avenue, Neiman Marcus, J.Crew, T.J. Maxx, Lord & Taylor, Calypso, Mint Julep, Anthropologie, Moxie, the Flat of the Hill, Wish, Filene's Basement, H&M—and you better believe Target's a favorite, too. I've found some amazing pieces there and people have actually stopped me on the street to ask me where they're from! I also love looking at antique stores for vintage jewelry. I don't believe you have to pay an arm and a leg to look good.

How would you describe your style?
I like to say my style is a bit schizophrenic. I love so many different looks and life's too short to feel pegged into one. Some days I feel preppy, others I feel modern and funky. It's so much fun to be able to dress in different ways and be influenced by different styles. I like keeping the basics tailored and classic and funking them up with great, trendier accessories. Same goes for a home—I enjoy mixing a really classically designed sofa with a sleek, modern side table and bright accessories. It's also really fun to throw something unexpected into the mix like a crazy fur vest or a really funky sculpture. "Fun" should always be an element of dressing and decorating.

How would you define luxury?
To me, luxury is not synonymous with expensive—it's being surrounded by things you love

"Putting together an outfit takes the same thought and skill that putting together a room does."

on your body and in your home. Patterns that make you smile, textures that feel good against the skin, details that charm you and speak to you. No matter what the cost, be it $5 or $5,000, if it speaks to you and makes you feel wonderful—that's luxury.

How important is it as an interior designer to be well-dressed?
It's incredibly important. Putting together an outfit takes the same thought and skill that putting together a room does. The way I dress [affects] how clients perceive my abilities to do my job well. So I make sure my clothing and accessories reflect my design philosophy, which is to mix high-end, affordable and vintage goods together to create something unique yet comfortable enough to really live in.

What do you refresh more often: your closet or your home?
The frequency with which I add new items to my closet is absolutely higher, because with home purchases, I have to think more thoroughly about how each item is going to work with everything else in the house. If I had to wear all my clothing at once, I'd have to apply the same logic and make sure every piece worked with the others—but I don't (thank goodness), so I pick up little things here and there just for fun all the time.

"Dig through the bargain bin. Stop at that tag sale. Go in the secondhand shop. You never know what you'll find."

How do you dress when you're hanging out on the weekend?
Actually, not that different. I really enjoy the creative process of getting dressed and creating new looks with what I have. Plus, you never know who you'll meet on the street. I always want to look decently polished to reflect my business in a good light. But believe me, there are days when I don't get out of my Lululemon yoga pants.

You have a daily blog: elementsofstyleblog.com. What was the inspiration behind it?
I grew up with an insanely talented architectural-designer father, and since I was a little girl, I've been playing with fabric samples and appreciating all the details of a well-designed home. I also worked for another big interior designer in Boston but felt there was a huge group of potential clients [who] didn't feel they had accessible help—young professionals without buckets of money, such as first-time condo buyers, renters and people who wanted help putting together a great-looking space on a budget. So I started the blog as a way to share all the knowledge and passion I had about design, which runs the gamut from the Boston Design Center to Ikea.

Do you focus more on home or clothing items in your blog?
My blog was started strictly as a venue to showcase my interior design finds, ideas and projects, but I do have a true passion for fashion and found myself desperately wanting to post about that as well, so now Fridays are dedicated to fashion. I'll post things from a great pair of shoes I found at Target to a ridiculously overpriced handbag I may be coveting at the moment. Fashion is a huge influence on interior design as well. Both focus on patterns, textures, shapes and trends. What you see on the runway may soon be reflected in a throw pillow on your couch.

What advice do you have for bargain shoppers?
Think creatively, be patient and look hard. If you see a chair with amazing lines, but the upholstery is ratty and gross, try to imagine it with a glossy coat of paint and a great new fabric. Also, don't let your ego dictate where you shop. I have found some of my favorite things at T.J. Maxx and HomeGoods—amazing lamps, cashmere sweaters and down-filled graphic throw pillows for $12. Dig through the bargain bin. Stop at that tag sale. Go in the secondhand shop. You never know what you'll find. ✖✖✖

BALLS FAIR (IN LOVE AND COOK-OFFS)

THE FIRST ANNUAL Ball Brawl, an outdoor meatball cook-off hosted by chef Dante deMagistris at his namesake restaurant, pits some of Boston's best cooks in a brawny battle royale. No boring spaghetti toppers or small, gluey Swedish things here. Meat-masters, including Andy Husbands of Tremont 647, Rodney Murillo of Avila and Jason Santos of Gargoyles on the Square, will season, mold and grill in a frantic bid for the title of "Best Balls of 'Em All."

More Gore

Bloody Good

Didn't get your gross-out fix this Halloween? New Repertory Theatre keeps the vein open with their production of Martin McDonagh's The Lieutenant of Inishmore at the Arsenal Center for the Arts. Set on an Irish island, the black comedy follows the twisted ways of Padraic, an outsider with a flair for torture. When his beloved cat turns up dead, he gushes vengeance and leaves a trail of blood that even Eli Roth would envy. The play runs through Nov. 16, when the stage crew will rejoice as they no longer have to mop up gallons of fake vital fluids. Kyle Wright

Capsules by Sean Burns

Appaloosa ★★ ½ I've always figured that Westerns are like pizza or sex: Even when mediocre, they're still pretty good. As far as the genre goes, Ed Harris' second directorial effort aspires to be more traditional than other recent revisionist works like Deadwood or The Assassination of Jesse James. Harris stars as a quick-tempered gun-for-hire recruited to rescue the title town from Jeremy Irons' nefarious, marble-mouthed robber baron. This leisurely-paced picture, adapted from a novel by local institution Robert Parker, coasts on the laconic chemistry between the star and his sidekick, played by Viggo Mortensen, who delivers another odd, endearing performance as a gunsmith more philosophical than his profession might suggest. Conversely, Renée Zellweger is too polished and perky to provide the lewd sparks required as a mysterious widow aiming to tear these longtime partners apart. Harris is content to amble along this well-trod terrain, offering small pleasures in lieu of urgency. (At Harvard and in the suburbs.)

Body of Lies ★★ Much like Alec Baldwin, Russell Crowe is way more fun when he's fat. Excess poundage seems to bring out an intense actor's more playful instincts, and Crowe is a porcine, honey-drawled delight as the smirking embodiment of American arrogance in Ridley Scott's otherwise dreary espionage thriller. David Ignatius' knotty novel was adapted by The Departed screenwriter William Monahan. Once again, we've got Leonardo DiCaprio undercover and in over his head. Scott has never been much interested in storytelling, and Body of Lies is so busy with showy aerial photography and confusingly edited action sequences that the plot doesn't really kick in until about halfway through. DiCaprio tries to track down a terrorist while juggling the suspicions of a Jordanian intelligence authority (an excellent Mark Strong) and the demands of a tacked-on romantic subplot involving an Iranian nurse. Crowe steals the show from the sidelines, stuffing his face and all but begging for a movie of his own. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Burn After Reading ★★★ ½ Don't be fooled by the vibrant colors of Emmanuel Lubezki's cinematography or the giant cartoon performances of the cast, because Joel and Ethan Coen's follow-up to their masterful No Country for Old Men is every bit as bleak as its Oscar-lauded predecessor. It's just a heck of a lot funnier. For reasons too convoluted to explain here, Brad Pitt's exuberant himbo gym instructor tries blackmailing John Malkovich's boozy CIA burnout, with more than a few unforeseen complications arriving via George Clooney's sleazy lothario and Tilda Swinton as the world's meanest pediatrician. Shot, cut and scored with the ominous overtones of a paranoid thriller yet performed as broad farce for maximum dissonance, the Coens send all this silliness spiraling into bloodshed with clockwork precision. Like most of the movies from these gifted, dyspeptic brothers, Burn is secretly about the tragic smallness of people and the fatality of self-absorption. Every character is doomed by assuming they're more important to the plot than they actually are. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

The Duchess ★★ Relatively painless, at least by the standards of awards-season chum, this overdesigned costume drama stars a too-modern Keira Knightley as poor Georgiana Spencer, a woman trapped in an arranged marriage to Ralph Fiennes' dreaded Duke of Devonshire. She's expected to produce an heir, and any paltry concerns like conversation are beside the point. A beloved fashionista and belle of the Whig Party, Georgiana's sprawling social life can't compensate for her domestic drudgery, especially after the Duke installs his mistress (Hayley Atwell) in a bedroom down the hall. The filmmakers pound home the historical parallels between Georgiana and Princess Diana, to the point where you can't help imagining a paparazzi pursuit of her horse-drawn carriage. With a contemptuous sneer, he plays the Duke not as a villain, but as a simple man suffering from such selfish tunnel vision that he responds to all the tears and ruined lives in his wake with surprised annoyance. (At Boston Common, Coolidge Corner and in the suburbs.)

Flash of Genius ★ ½ Director Marc Abraham's debut follows a long patent dispute regarding the invention of the intermittent windshield-wiper motor. It's not as exciting as it sounds. Greg Kinnear stars as Bob Kearns, a devoted dad who sees his design stolen by the Ford Motor Company, then spends the rest of his life fighting for credit. Structured as a simplistic David and Goliath story and photographed like a 1980s TV movie, Flash of Genius follows plucky Bob as he wrangles with legal issues for years on end and immerses himself in Byzantine law precedents

Changeling

THIS ONE HURTS.

Conventional wisdom dictates that Martin Scorsese is America's greatest living filmmaker, and though I would never dare argue against such gospel, Clint Eastwood is still my favorite. The pesky difference between "best" and "favorite" is the kind of semantic insanity that drives critics to distraction, as it removes objectivity and fact, and places a review into a trickier, more subjective frame. Of course Citizen Kane is the best and most innovative movie ever made, but it still doesn't move me the way The Wild Bunch does. We reviewers thrive on simple, authoritative

STELLA ARTOIS

Perfection HAS ITS PLACE

A perfectly poured Stella Artois is the Gold Standard of Belgian beer.

Step One THE PURIFICATION

The bartender selects the signature glass for the beer being poured. The glass is scrubbed in a cool-water bath, preferably with a mild detergent. It's then rinsed with cold water to chill the glass.

Step Two THE SACRIFICE

The tap is opened in one swift motion to let the first burst of foam flow away. It must never enter the glass, thus ensuring every drop of beer is fresh.

Step Three THE LIQUID ALCHEMY

The glass is held at a 45-degree angle to create the perfect balance of liquid to foam.

Step Four THE HEAD

The head is created by straightening and lowering the glass. The foam is visually appealing and releases the beer's aroma.

Step Five THE REMOVAL

The bartender closes the tap in one quick action and moves the glass away from the faucet to ensure no drops spoil the perfect head.

Step Six THE BEHEADING

While the beer is flowing over the edge of the glass, the bartender cuts the head gently with a head cutter at a 45-degree angle. This eliminates the larger bubbles that burst easily and accelerate the dissipation of the head.

Step Seven THE JUDGMENT

The bartender now stands in judgment. The beer's head should be two fingers thick.

Step Eight THE CLEANSING

The bartender then rinses the bottom and sides of the glass. This keeps the glass clean and cool and makes it comfortable to hold.

Step Nine THE BESTOWAL

statements and thus feel threatened by gray areas.

Scorsese can shoot circles around Eastwood, and he consistently breaks new ground in the language of expression by pushing the boundaries of editing and scoring. Scorsese also works about half as often, keeping a much more respectable masterpiece-to-dud ratio, but there's still something about seeing an Eastwood picture that makes me feel like I'm cozying into my favorite bathrobe and sprawling out on the recliner.

Eastwood's filmmaking is often as sparse and reticent as his onscreen persona. It doesn't matter whether it's The Outlaw Josey Wales, Heartbreak Ridge or The Bridges of Madison County, Eastwood pictures are always about guys who got the bum end of the American dream, guys who loved and lost and then just kept losing. And most of the time it's nobody's fault but their own. Eastwood's movies never seem to end well, and as the years wear on, they've only grown darker and more unforgiving.

His Changeling is a nasty little number that's grueling and unpleasant in the manner of all late-period Eastwood, but it's missing the crucial moral uncertainty that marks his masterpieces. Angelina Jolie stars as Christine Collins in this purportedly true story of a flapper-era single mom whose son is kidnapped and murdered. Five months later, the famously corrupt LAPD returns a child who bears a slight resemblance. They then lock Collins up after she dares to point out that this shorter, circumcised weirdo isn't actually her son.

Despite a preponderance of physical evidence (his penis and height were obviously inadmissible), Collins is nonetheless banished to the booby hatch, and don't think the outrageous injustice of it all escapes Eastwood for a second. He's righteously pissed—shooting Jolie in angelic, silent movie tableaux and casting the L.A. cops as sniveling, wormy toads. Jeffrey Donovan, the cut-rate Guy Pearce look-alike playing Collins' grand inquisitor, lacks only a mustache to twirl. As the film wore on, I worried he might tie her to railroad tracks.

John Malkovich costars as a radical Presbyterian minister who hates the LAPD and spends his weekly radio show lobbying for Collins' release. As another form of injustice, somehow "Malkovich as a radical Presbyterian minister" comes across as one-note and dull. In a tragic waste of a deeply strange performer, Malkovich is just a bland old goody-goody, albeit one with weird hair and kooky enunciations.

To some extent, Eastwood's entire career has been based on a free-floating contempt for institutionalized power. His work chronicles the oft-tragic fates of those who buck intransigent bureaucracies and pay a horrible price. But his protagonists are typically just as flawed as the systems they're battling. Who can forget Dirty Harry tossing his badge into the river? Even an underrated genre throwaway like 1999's True Crime ends with Eastwood's dry-drunk antihero saving an innocent man from death row, only to spend Christmas alone; his ex-wife still hates his guts and their daughter thinks he's a jerk. Redemption never comes easy in his flicks.

Changeling isn't just a disturbing anomaly in that Jolie plays an alabaster saint, but also because every slightly interesting angle in this perplexing, James Ellroy-friendly tale of police corruption (from a screenplay by Babylon 5 writer J. Michael Straczynski) has been flattened and oversimplified to the point of preposterousness. The movie goes on for an hour and a half past what I've described, chronicling not one but two anticlimactic courtroom showdowns and restating what we've already seen, reels after we've lost interest.

Eastwood burnishes Jolie's character to such a squeaky clean that she isn't just smarter than all the cops, but an ill-advised epilogue even shows her as the only person who predicts It Happened One Night to win over Cleopatra at the Oscars. Eastwood's never had to deal with such an insufferably perfect protagonist before, and let's hope he never does again. ✖✖✖ while his family falls apart, which all builds up to the inevitable courtroom theatrics. Despite Kinnear's attempts to hint at a darker side, Kearns is pure milquetoast. Lauren Graham tamps down her charisma and sleepwalks through the long-suffering wife routine, and even dependable Dermot Mulroney flatlines as Bob's business partner. The only pizzazz arrives via a brief, hambone turn from Alan Alda as a smooth-talking lawyer who seems to have wandered in from another, far more engaging movie. (In the suburbs.)

Man on Wire ★★★ ½ Funny how the most exciting heist picture in ages turns out to be a documentary. Director James Marsh's artfully crafted, edge-of-your-seat adventure tells the tale of tightrope walker Philipe Petit, who one morning in 1974 danced on a high-wire between the World Trade Center's Twin Towers. Combining hyperbolically shot reenactments and stunning archival footage with the gregarious reminiscences of Petit and his band of coconspirators, Marsh lays out the elaborate break-in with the snap precision and cinematic verve of a Danny Ocean caper. All the more poignant for never once mentioning 9/11, the movie uses old photographs to let the majestic towers speak for themselves, which lends Man On Wire a shade of sorrow the filmmaker is wise enough not to push. Petit is a florid and quixotic interview subject perfectly in sync with the film's evocation of the anything-goes paradise that was New York City in the 1970s. The breathtaking climax triggers many contradictory emotions as Petit's stunt was so reckless, so foolish and so magical. (At Coolidge Corner and in the suburbs.)

Nick and Norah's Infinite Playlist ★★★ ½ If you can get past the most twee movie title in years, director Peter Sollett's follow-up to his endearing indie-hit Raising Victor Vargas turns out to be unexpectedly adorable. It's sincere and awkward where Juno was fabricated and crass. Michael Cera stars as a heartbroken teen bass player, a straight man in an all-gay punk band, the name of which cannot be printed here. Through a variety of convoluted circumstances, he finds himself stuck in a Yugo after a gig with Kat Dennings' insecure dreamgirl. They cruise the streets of New York City after curfew, meandering through misadventures and fumbling toward puppy love. Based on a young adult novel by Rachel Cohn and David Levithan, Nick and Norah exudes an uncommon sensitivity, patiently allowing these kids to mumble and make mistakes, so unlike their poised peers on film and television. As in Victor Vargas, there's a real delicacy to Sollett's direction, with an almost enchanted sense of late-night magic infusing his grungy East Village settings. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Rachel Getting Married ★★★★ Jonathan Demme's extraordinary new film transforms a weekend wedding party into a tapestry of jumbled humanity. Taking a cue from the late Robert Altman, Demme packs his frames with overlapping chatter and cockeyed conviviality. Cutting through the clatter is Anne Hathaway's revelatory performance as Kym, the bad-seed sister fresh out of rehab who hijacks the festivities with one narcissistic faux pas after another. The screenplay, by first-timer Jenny Lumet (daughter of legendary director Sidney), has a few tricks up its sleeve, including an old family tragedy from which Mom (Debra Winger) and Dad (Bill Irwin) may never fully recover. What's most miraculous about Rachel is how expertly Demme navigates Lumet's hairpin tonal shifts. The film swings from hilarious to crushing and back again, sometimes within the space of a single scene. There's so much joy in this movie—so much music and happiness spilling outside the frame—but also stark, unflinching pain. (At Coolidge Corner, Kendall Square and Waltham Embassy.)

Religulous ★★ Amusing, but in a way that's cheap and makes you feel sullied afterward, comedian Bill Maher's anti-religion film is a worthwhile concept botched in the execution. Traveling from trailer parks to the Vatican, Maher and director Larry Charles position themselves as skeptical crusaders preaching the gospel of rationality and science to folks who have little use for either. But zealotry is an easy target, and it doesn't exactly require a great deal of skill to make a creationist look like an imbecile. Maher's thesis, namely that some form of organized religion will catalyze the end of civilization, isn't entirely unreasonable. The problem is that the comic spends most of the movie riffing on addled lunatics who are no match for his formidable intellect, and a stale smugness sets in. Maher's invaluable HBO show finds him at his best because he's being challenged, and a braver, tougher movie would force him to debate reasonable people of faith, instead of just sneering at crackpots. (At Boston Common, Kendall Square and in the suburbs.)

Synecdoche, New York ★★ In his startlingly original screenplays for Being John Malkovich, Adaptation and Eternal Sunshine of the Spotless Mind, Charlie Kaufman merged depressive angst with absurdist whimsy to create his own genre: heartsick slapstick. His directorial debut, a grammar-nerd goof on my mom's hometown of Schenectady, is similarly ambitious but lacks any levity or momentum. The film is obsessed with the ways art cannibalizes life, the deterioration of the human body and finally the grim inevitability of death. Philip Seymour Hoffman stars as a sickly theater director attempting to make sense of his life by staging it as an ever-evolving theater experience, until he becomes so consumed with recasting and rewriting that he loses all trace of himself. It's a nifty metaphor, one perhaps more suited for a novel, but as a feature, Synecdoche is an unbearable grind that's relentlessly one-note, dingy and oppressive as you wait for everybody to die of old age. The movie is thrilling to discuss afterward, but torture to actually sit through. (At Kendall Square and Waltham Embassy.)

Vicky Cristina Barcelona ★★ ½ Though problematic and slightly sloppy, this pleasant trifle is Woody Allen's most consistent effort since 1999's loopy La Strada remake, Sweet and Lowdown. Rebecca Hall and Scarlett Johansson star as Vicky and Cristina, American postgrads spending a summer in Spain. Enter Javier Bardem's free-spirited Latin lover and stock stereotype, who probably would be risible if played by any other actor. Bardem delivers his loosest, goofiest performance yet, embracing the role's mildewed clichés with contagious delight. Romantic entanglements and disentanglements ensue, complicated by stomach ulcers, girl-girl crushes and ill-advised rushes to the altar. The most fun comes from Bardem's ex-wife, a lusty psycho played in a movie-stealing turn by Pené-lope Cruz. Allen's direction is perkier and more alert than his recent work; he even moves the camera once in a while, soaking up the Barcelona scenery and gazing adoringly on his good-looking cast. Modest in both aim and accomplishment, it's hardly a return to form, but it'll do. (At Coolidge Corner, Waltham Embassy and in the suburbs.)

W. ★★★ Hardly the comic hit-piece Dems were hoping for, Oliver Stone's curiously compassionate take on Bush turns out to be one of the legendary muckracker's most restrained pictures. Hewing largely to the historical record, Stanley Weiser's succinct screenplay runs on double tracks, alternating snatches of Dubya's wasted youth and born-again reformation with scenes from our long walk to war in Iraq. In the title role, Josh Brolin exhibits an uncanny mastery of the sputtering grammatical train wrecks and apish arm gestures that have made their mark these past eight years. It's bizarrely entertaining to watch Stone's blunt force dramatizations of those sinister cabinet meetings, with special scorn heaped on Toby Jones' Karl Rove and Richard Dreyfuss' subtly menacing Dick Cheney. As in his audacious 1995 biopic, Nixon, Stone can't help but muster sympathy for the devil. W. is the tragedy of a deeply shallow, arrogant man, who works out his daddy issues on an international stage. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

The Women ★★ The best joke in Diane English's klutzy update of George Cukor's 1939 classic might be the overabundance of screamingly obvious Boston locations, even though characters onscreen insist they're standing in Manhattan.

Meg Ryan attempts to emote through some dire plastic surgery, puckering her inflated trout-pout after finding her hubby having an affair with Eva Mendes, an actress as curvy as her line readings are flat. Annette Bening rallies the rest of the Ya-Ya Sisterhood of the Traveling Whatever, and lots of shrieking ensues. There's a surprisingly complex, scene-stealing turn from Candice Bergen as Ryan's seen-it-all mom and a few good character riffs from guest-stars Cloris Leachman and Bette Midler, but English, creator of Murphy Brown, suffers from a visually inert TV sensibility. The Women feels more like a promising sitcom pilot, one that's somehow easier to take simply because none of these characters are as narcissistic, materialistic or disgusting as the ones in Sex and the City. (In the suburbs.)

Zack and Miri Make a Porno ★★★ Kevin Smith's first decent film in a decade conspicuously borrows current comedy hero Judd Apatow's stock company of actors. This makes a strange sort of sense, as the man-children and scatological sweetness of Apatow's The 40-Year-Old Virgin and Superbad owe enormous debts to Smith's do-it-yourself debut, Clerks. It's also just refreshing to see trained professionals handle Smith's unwieldy, overwritten dialogue as opposed to his high-school buddies or Ben Affleck. The hilarious Seth Rogen and a luminous Elizabeth Banks star as broke best friends attempting to make a stag movie for quick cash and discovering unexpected feelings once it comes time to perform. Sunny and optimistic even when wallowing in potty-mouthed filth (real-life porn stars Traci Lords and Katie Morgan play pivotal roles), the film is an unexpectedly heartfelt salute to the creative process. Zack and Miri fosters fond feelings for this makeshift family of slackers, who grow and prosper by focusing their energy into a productive endeavor, even if it's one that involves anal sex. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Star producer/musician Daniel Lanois brings his mojo to Berklee.

Daniel Lanois
plays the Berklee Performance Center Nov. 16.

IT'S AN UNDERSTATEMENT TO say Daniel Lanois is enthusiastic about the U2 album that he's been working on in Morocco and elsewhere with his coproducing partner Brian Eno. "It has entered a new sonic territory that I've never experienced before—it's almost beyond description," Lanois says. "It ranks right up there. It's the future of rock 'n' roll."

U2 doesn't need the hype, but Lanois wields a mighty yardstick on the subject. He and Eno have helmed four of the band's greatest albums, including 1987's The Joshua Tree and 1991's Achtung Baby. In fact, Lanois was sole producer of

Achtung Baby's pioneering industrial-hybrid tracks "Zoo Station" and "The Fly."

The Canadian native has also produced landmark albums for Bob Dylan (his Grammy-winning comeback Time Out of Mind), Peter Gabriel, Emmylou Harris, Robbie Robertson, Willie Nelson and the Neville Brothers. "People appreciate honesty, and I'm brought in to have an opinion," says Lanois, 57. "I'm not star-struck at a moment of providing good advice."

He also provides darkly luminous atmospheres that have become his signature—drawing on emotional instincts as much as technology. "I'm a studio rat, and I'm the best," Lanois says with a chuckle from his Toronto studio. "I like working with people whose views I admire," he adds. "A philosophical exchange usually exists before the musical one."

Similar musical exchanges inform his own CDs as a singer, songwriter and guitarist. His 1989 solo debut Acadie ranked with that year's best albums, bridging the French-Canadian folk of his youth with New Orleans groove and shimmering guitar textures. Just as Lanois plays and sings on his outside productions, Eno and members of U2 and the Neville Brothers also make cameos on Acadie, and the sound and spirit of those artists bleed onto his palette much the way he leaves an imprint on their work. "We're just floating by on history," Lanois says. "You're going to be bumping up against other characters, and we operate by osmosis."

Berklee students also get to absorb Lanois' mojo when he becomes an artist-in-residence at the music college. He'll play Nov. 16 at the Berklee Performance Center with a quartet that features drummer extraordinaire Brian Blade (Dylan, Wayne Shorter, Joni Mitchell), who'll join Lanois for workshops that week. "It's a little foreign to me because I'm not schooled," he says. "I never came up the recording studio ladder. I started my own thing with my brother, and we learned on our own."

The Quebec-born Lanois and his brother Bob were weaned on a traditional-music background. Their father and grandfather were both fiddlers. "It was a self-entertaining society," Lanois says. "People would get together on weekends and hoot and holler, and then the violins would come out."

Lanois picked up the pennywhistle at age 9, the year his family relocated to Ontario. Later, he switched to slide guitar and embraced his tape recorder. "I played and made my own little tapes and that was the beginning," he says. He and Bob started charging local bands a $60 studio fee. Lanois soon recorded everything from reggae and funk (Rick James was a cross-the-border client from Buffalo) to gospel quartets that toured Canada before stopping at his studio.

"I recorded thousands of albums, very quick ones, and that was the basis of my education," he says. "I got to understand the interplay of four parts, and those four parts exist not only in a singing quartet, but they exist in funk music and Bach and rock music."

Today, Lanois records albums for his own Red Floor label, available through his Web site. They include the new Here Is What Is (a soundtrack/film documenting a year in his life, including the U2 sessions) and a 20th anniversary edition of Acadie with extra tracks. Lanois says he'll play a few Acadie songs in Boston, including "The Maker," which was covered by Dave Matthews, Willie Nelson and Jerry Garcia, among others.

"I don't have the campaign power that my visible clients have," he says. "I like helping people, and I like making great records. If they can get to the top of the charts and those are seen to be the work that I do, rather than a folk song that Danny writes in the woods in Canada, I'm OK with that. I can bring my wares to any town and hold my head up." ✖✖✖

Leon Kings

Brothers Keepers If the Hollywood remake wave ever tackled the Partridge Family, they could do worse than hiring Kings of Leon to give the sibling-band shtick a hip, modern edge. Cooler than the Jonas Brothers (and with better music), Caleb, Nathan, Jared and Matthew Followill boast half-a-million fans on their Facebook and Myspace pages, a practically sold-out tour and a UK charts No. 1 album. They play the Orpheum Theatre on Nov. 12 and 13, but get a ticket fast. Groupies have evolved, and the Followill's flirty followers are even smarter and quicker than the ones David Crosby knew back in his golden days. Thais Collins

Rockie Horoscope { ROCKIE GARDINER }

IN A PINCE

[OCTOBER 23–NOVEMBER 21]
Where do your loyalties reside? Are you supporting the changes advocated by innovative Uranus in your Pisces house of romance, risk and recreation? Are you that game? Or are you counting on safe, tradition-bound Saturn and your network of acquaintances? Their planetary opposition could have you ricocheting from pillar to post for another year, so if you're involved in a romantic attachment, be prepared to pay some serious dues. If not, assume that area of your life is liable to become a lot more interesting.

SAGITTARIUS [November 22–December 21] Magnetic Venus in your sign could draw more attention to you personally than you need or want right now. Why in the world would you simultaneously challenge disruptive Uranus in your home base and restrictive Saturn in your career zone? And on Election Day, no less! Shouldn't Venus be helping you make peace between powerful opposing forces, not provoke further dissension? However, after you realize this is only the beginning, that more planets transiting Sagittarius can acerbate the situation, you'll be better prepared.

CAPRICORN [December 22–January 20] You're aware that it's been building, and before this crucial week is over, everyone will know that the generational opposition between your productive Saturn ruler and destructive Uranus is here. Also, that it's not going away anytime soon, not until summer 2010. Thankfully, Saturn is in Virgo, a supportive earth sign that governs your ninth house of lifelong goals. Before Saturn moves on to Libra and energizes your career zone, take time this year to further pursue interests you've developed, to travel and study.

AQUARIUS [January 21–February 18] Structure out of chaos? It's possible. If you're a typical Aquarius, with a wide range of interests and a wider range of friends, you might welcome the form strict Saturn is trying to impose on Uranus, your nonconformist ruling planet. Especially if their polarity can transform your financial picture. But that'll take more time than what may transpire this week as militant Mars in your career zone challenges wishy-washy, day-dreamy Neptune in your sign. The God of War is issuing an order: Do it now!

PISCES [February 19–March 19] As you well know, exciting, exotic Uranus is in Pisces and stern, sensible Saturn is occupying your Virgo house of significant others. Who might those fogies be and why are they trying to squelch your fabulousness? The first polarity between these incongruous planetary forces in 40 years is upon us; however, few signs will be as affected as the Fish. You might want to read Virgo, Capricorn and Aquarius' horoscopes for further clues before this potent pairing separates in 2010.

ARIES [March 20–April 19] The last load of bull to sort out got dumped on your doorstep when idealistic and/or duplicitous Neptune faced forward after sifting through retrograde repetitions since Memorial Day. On Election Eve, your perceptive Mars ruler cut through the retouched images Neptune has been projecting, so your vote might have changed. There may be more dubious business filtering down around the Veteran's Day full moon, but by then, a crusading Ram will have other fish to fry. Possibly along a river far from home.

TAURUS [April 20–May 20] Your appreciative Venus ruler may be showing you a good time as it travels through optimistic Sagittarius. However, the goddess can be a target for the tension generated by the opposition between "stay the course" Saturn and revolutionary Uranus. Were you aware that the conflict between these contrasting planetary energies last peaked during the late 1960s? Although their current face-off might not seem as significant, on your solar chart it is pitting group mores against individual creativity and pure love.

GEMINI [May 21–June 20] It's out of your hands. In case the Twins were having a hard time making up your mind, relax. While Venus is in your Sagittarius marriage house, let your mate handle the issues that arise during the opposition between conservative Saturn and progressive Uranus. Seriously, harmonious Venus is often a better arbitrator; besides your ability to behave like a rational human being may be colored by your Mercury ruler's transit through suspicious Scorpio from Election Day to Nov. 22. That's when you're especially receptive to conspiracy theories.

CANCER [June 21–July 22] Your source of inspiration can come from far away, so don't dismiss any forays into sci-fi lit or esoteric travel articles. They're likely to influence your next assignment and the one after that. Health professionals and charity workers may devise an unusual way to get around a local restriction or another obstacle to delivering your services. While it might be a hassle, don't count on getting sufficient help until amenable Venus arrives in your Capricorn house of partners during the Taurus full moon on Nov. 12.

LEO [July 23–August 22] It may cost more than you figured, but denying affectionate Venus anything the goddess asks while she fills your Sagittarius house of romance with love and luck could be difficult, if not impossible. Not while she's willing to deflect a good amount of the tension flowing between restrictive Saturn in your own money house and erratic Uranus in your house of shared resources. That battle will rage on and off for a year, so, despite your generous spirit, try to conserve when money is tight so you can treat when it's not.

VIRGO [August 23–September 22] If only you were riding the seesaw of love. The ups and downs you'll be subjected to concern your self-image, i.e., how you feel about yourself depending on what's going on with your partners. By now you should have a good idea about the benefits and drawbacks stabilizing Saturn has been offering Virgins. What you're about to learn is how much control Saturn can exert over unpredictable Uranus in your Pisces marriage house. Will their polarity keep relationships on an even keel or will you vacillate between high highs and low lows?

LIBRA [September 23–October 22] Read for Taurus and Gemini. Because Venus is your ruling planet, you need to know if there's a chance you'll become a whipping boy—i.e., if erratic Uranus in your work zone has it in for you. And if so, for how long. You should also be aware that Mars in your Scorpio money house is about to attack the vision idealistic Neptune has created during its long reign in your Aquarius house of love and stuff. Will that vision lose its funding when the Scorpio sun and Mercury set their sights on matters of Neptunian faith?

THE ZOO'S WHO LIST

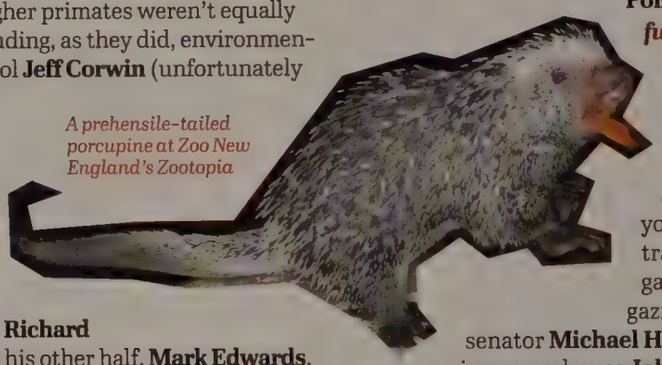
Calling Dr. Doolittle...

No offense to the people on hand, but the most interesting guests at Zootopia—the jungle-themed fundraiser for Zoo New England held at the Intercontinental—were all non-human.

There was a prehensile-tailed porcupine from Brazil, a lizard known as a skink, a tiny owl, a cockatoo (insert dirty joke here) and a snake that several people agreed would make gorgeous shoes or a handbag.

Not that the higher primates weren't equally delightful, including, as they did, environmentalist/sex symbol Jeff Corwin (unfortunately not wearing those khaki shorts he does on TV), latter-day Goldie Hawn Jillian Kuzyk, hunky plastic surgeon Richard Silverman and his other half, Mark Edwards, cheese mogul Brad Wasik and the cute-as-a-button Meghan "Fitzy-B" Fitzgerald, massage god Michael Moore, PR princess and party cochair Marlo Fogelman (aka Margo Fogelberg), fitness guru Mike D'Angelo, fiery Latina Nicole Morales, beauty tycoon Richard DeAgazio and one woman who said, "Is that a frog in your pocket, or are you just happy to see me?" (The raffle tickets were in the form of little stuffed tree-frogs.)



A prehensile-tailed porcupine at Zoo New England's Zootopia

Overheard at the bar: a guest observed, "Three million dollars doesn't go as far as it used to." To which a friend replied, "Maybe. But I'd still like to find out exactly how far it does go."

Modesty Is Fine in Moderation...

The amount spent on shoes and haircuts alone could have bailed out Wall Street when The Point Foundation held a fundraising hoo-ha at the Four Seasons.

Benefiting a scholarship program for gay, lesbian, bisexual and transgendered youth, the party attracted a predominantly gay crowd, among them: gazillionaire former U.S. senator Michael Huffington, advertising powerhouse John Wolfarth, the designing Michaels, Barnum and Carter, the definitively fabulous Phillip Lovejoy and Jim Moses, banking bigwig Wendell Chestnut and ever so many more.

A refreshing change of pace: The speakers were brief, to the point and highly entertaining, as was the following exchange:

"There are a lot of cute guys here."

"I know. I'm one of them."

Contest of the Month...

"You just skewed the average age in here down by 20 years," someone (flatteringly) told a middle-aged man at the Opening Night gala for the Celebrity Series held at Jordan Hall.

Given that it was an 80th birthday party for world-famous pianist Leon Fleischer, and that following dinner, he played a dazzling concert alongside his wife, Katherine, Yefim Bronfman and Jonathan Biss, a few wrinkles could easily be overlooked.

Actually, the crowd was way more glittery than it was geriatric, including the likes of the staggeringly charming Dr. Anna Davol and her other half, Dr. Peter B., force of nature Sheryl Marshall and her other half, Howard Salwen, stunning blonde Margarita Rudyak, arts patron Joanne Walton Dickinson and the Winstens, Nancy and Joseph, who endowed the performance.

The evening's biggest riddle: Which flustered woman, in a hurry to reach her seat, got escorted by a Conservatory student through the bustling downstairs men's room?

Anyone who can correctly identify her will receive an Improper Bostonian coffee mug.

And so will she, just as long as she promises to switch to decaf.

Cue the Boomtown Rats...

Nobody's better than gay people at denying that the weekend inevitably gives way to Monday (we invented tea dance, for God's sake!). Fortunately, Boston Ballet figured out how to capitalize on it.

Sunday Night Out took guests backstage to the costume shop to see what goes into mounting major productions—and, yes, one of the very first questions asked was (unfortunately), "What do the male dancers wear under their tights?"

The answer is a dance belt, which is about as sexy as a hemorrhoid. More interesting was the fact that they spend $3,000 in dry cleaning on the Nutcracker alone, and more than $145,000 a year on shoes (to the average gay man, those are statistics worth aspiring to).

Afterward, everyone went over to 28 Degrees for libations, where Verna Turbulence and Miss Kris Knevil performed.

And the next thing you know, it was another hungover Monday morning. Ouch. ✖✖✖

Give a Little Bit

A Leica camera, Tara Donovan's coffee-table book, vintage necklaces… I hope my husband reads this letter. I have my eye on all three items, which appear in our annual gift guide. In a nod to the economy, we've included options for as little as $5 this year, along with some splurges.

Speaking of indulgences, Jonathan Soroff tried to hawk an old, weather-beaten sweatshirt for $1,200 at Stel's for this issue. His grand experiment involved rescuing the sweatshirt from the sea and starting a clothing line. He's not any richer, a sign that common sense and fashion sense don't always go together.

Soroff also had a timely, post-election chat with political satirist and comedian Mo Rocca. After a weekend of holiday shopping, relax with Rocca on NPR's Wait Wait… Don't Tell Me! It's free entertainment.

Pie-Eyed EASY AS

IN AN AGE WHEN desserts are rated for their elaborate appearance as much as their taste, pity the poor pie. Consider the traditional apple, America's national dessert. It's so taken for granted that baking an exceptional one is becoming a lost art, says Elli Kaplansky, owner of the Pie Bakery and Cafe in Newton Center.

"People who come into the shop say, 'I haven't had a pie like this since my mom or my grandmother was baking,'" recounts Kaplansky, 52.

A former pastry chef at Todd English's Figs, she embarked on her bakery adventure a year ago to tap into, and satisfy, those pie purists' nostalgia.

"People have pie memories, and it's usually just something warm and fuzzy," Kaplansky says. "For me, there's a great memory of pies. My grandmother was a phenomenal baker and I grew up by her side. She would roll out pie after pie."

The cafe also offers savory selections, including pasties, a Cornish dish that traces its origins to wives fixing a compact lunch their miner husbands could enjoy underground. Kaplansky's version is stuffed with wild rice, chicken and a separate portion of apple compote. "It's a whole meal in one with a dessert," she says.

The holiday season is a big time for pies, of course. For Thanksgiving, Kaplansky is taking orders for apple, apple crumble, pumpkin, pecan and Derby.

Apple is the most popular, she says, but pumpkin is a close second. Either flavor makes a great holiday gift for a host. "Instead of bringing a bottle of wine, or in addition to bringing a bottle of wine, bring a pie."

JOHN DYER

Drink of the Moment

Pump and Circumstance

With only three months as head bartender at the Alchemist in Jamaica Plain, 32-year-old Derric Crothers created the fall drink menu as his first solo endeavor. By incorporating soy milk into cocktails like the Peach Cobbler ($9), Crothers honors his audience. "Being in JP, it's vegan-friendly," he says.

Crothers also pays tribute to the "Peanuts" comic strip with the Alchemist's biggest seasonal seller: the Great Pumpkin ($9), prepared with a house-made infusion of vodka, roasted and raw squash, and a blend of spices. Using four to six gallons a week, he observes, "I can barely keep up with making the vodka."

"You're going to have to start making it in your bathtub," jokes a nearby barman, perhaps only half kidding.

The cocktail is like a Pumpkinhead beer for martini drinkers. "What I was going for was pumpkin pie," Crothers says, "but to still keep a nice bite to it." The bite comes courtesy of the 100-proof Smirnoff at the infusion's base. "I'm not a vodka drinker, but I'd definitely sit down with a snifter of the pumpkin vodka," he adds. Many patrons already have, preferring it on the rocks. It's another insight into JP, where cocktails flow (lactose) freely. NICK ALTSCHULLER

ASK THE EXPERT

Q: HOW DOES HOLIDAY MUSIC GET PEOPLE IN THE SHOPPING MOOD?

VICTOR COELHO PROFESSOR OF MUSIC AT BU

Holiday music has always been a well-understood genre, and many of the earliest carols contain lyrics that evoke the bearing of gifts—gold, frankincense and myrrh—from Matthew's account of the Three Kings. So, music and the act of giving gifts are traditionally intertwined, and it is natural that one inspires the other. But does holiday music inspire us to shop (and not just give)? Modern holiday music is full of "product placement" (mistletoe, ornaments, wreaths and trees) and references to "presents" or "gifts" ("I'll Be Home for Christmas," "We Three Kings"); and the most famous of all modern carols, "The Twelve Days of Christmas," is a dodeca-splurge of mostly fowl stuff with a sticker price at checkout of a few hundred-thousand dollars (the dancing ladies and golden rings being the most expensive; the 12 drummers will usually play for beer). Add to this the snappy, feel-good arrangements of these songs, the clever programming through store muzak, windup toys, commercials, films and 24/7 holiday radio stations, and you have music as the perfect holiday retailer. LEAH MENNIES

Gourmet Grilled Cheese

Forget neon Kraft singles and doughy Wonder slices. The humble yet decadent merger of cheese and bread has grown up—and seems much more appealing than it did as grade-school grub. It's cheap, fast and swoon-worthy on a cold afternoon, which explains why almost every chef in town has worked it onto the lunch menu. Our vote goes to the version at Sel de la Terre on Boylston Street, dressed for fall with French raclette, apple, quince paste, house-smoked bacon and fig-anise bread. It's the perfect pick-me-up after shopping on Newbury. ELIZABETH BOMZE

TERMINAL HUNGER

Unless you fly first class, expect little more than pretzels on the plane this holiday season. Curb your stomach pains before boarding at Logan International. The airport's dining options—the best of which are outposts of popular city restaurants—have vastly improved in recent years. LINH TRAN BRINCAT

Terminal A:
You've hit the jackpot of food choices in this terminal, especially if beer and seafood sound good.

Terminal B:
Scaled-down seafood and an upscale steakhouse are the best options.

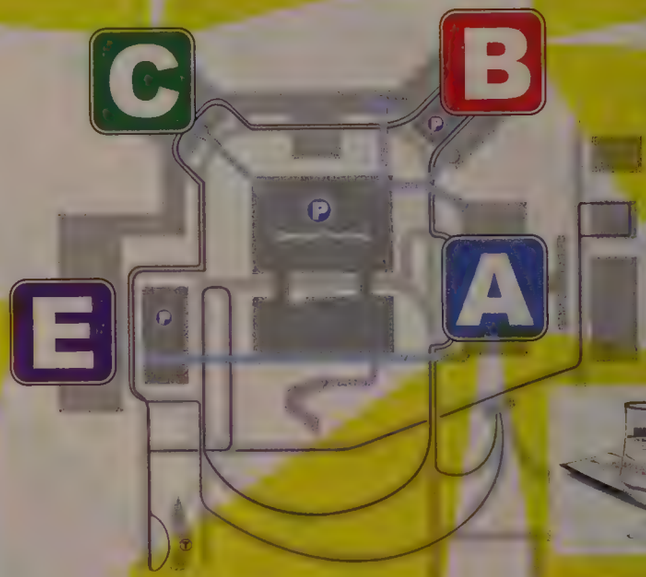
Terminal C:
Like Terminal A, Terminal C features a couple of reliable seafood and beer choices.

Terminal E:
Sorry international jetsetters, your eating options are ironically and sorely limited at this terminal.

Boston Beer Works
This branch of the Kenmore Square brewpub/restaurant serves a selection of 8–10 beers, as well as dishes like the Back Bay burger with blue cheese.

Legal Sea Foods Restaurant
This 60-year-old Boston-based institution can thank consistently fresh fare for its longevity. In addition to the standard selections, Legal's also offers a take-out menu for fast fish—like Portuguese fisherman's stew and New England fried clams.

Legal C Bar
If LTK is the fuchsia-haired sibling of the Legal Sea Foods family, Legal C Bar is the runty word player. The majority of Legal C's menu consists of foods that start with the letter C, so grab some clams, cod, crab cakes and cocktails before or after a flight.



Todd English's Bonfire
This mini-version of the celebrity chef's Park Plaza restaurant offers upscale dining options like a Kobe beef corndog and house-made guacamole with shrimp cocktail.

Dine Boston Bar & Grill
Former Red Sox outfielder Darren Lewis' restaurant might not have a lot of competition in Terminal E, but it has a decent selection of pizzas, burgers and pastas, plus an outstanding dessert menu featuring sweet treats from Rosie's bakery in Cambridge.

Legal's Test Kitchen
The more experimental sibling of Boston's popular Legal Sea Foods, this 80-seat restaurant boasts a 15-minute wait-time for its meals, which include tandoori-grilled Atlantic salmon and crab cakes.

Harpoon Tap Room
Try a variety of seasonal beers and slurp your fill of chowders at this offshoot of the Boston-based brewery.

FRANKLY SPEAKING

Near his new location in South Boston, Franklin Café co-owner David Dubois paces a room stuffed with boxes of barstools and glassware, his cell phone stuck to his ear. Not surprising for a man who probably won't rest until his restaurant opens. "No, I won't sleep for a week after that," Dubois corrects.

Joining branches in Gloucester and the South End, the latest Franklin Café, which debuts Nov. 19, is a modern, burnished step in the mini-brand's evolution. "Every one of our restaurants is reflective of the neighborhood it's in," says Dubois, gesturing to giant windows showcasing Southie.

The food, prepared by South End carryover Brian Reyelt, will also be customized—"a bit more polished, but similar in style," Dubois explains. Entrees include a spice-grilled tofu steak with Indonesian fried rice, pineapple and a farm egg ($16), and Chatham cod with arugula and green wheat and beet pilaf ($19). The dishes reflect the cafe's surroundings, including a yoga studio and nearby green-certified building. "We're trying to keep a little lightness while still staying who we are," he says.

Other additions include raw-bar items, outdoor seating and convertible booths that fit parties up to 20, an impossibility in the South End. Brunch, once just a passing tease, will be served all weekend, as the cafe aims to go from newbie to neighbor. "Southie feels like a true reflection of Boston as a whole," Dubois says. "I hope this is going to be a restaurant the community takes ownership of and takes as their own." NICK ALTSCHULLER

OPEN DOOR, INSERT FOOT

TO A VERY LARGE DOG AND HIS OBNOXIOUS SOUTH END OWNER:
Today, I woke up rejuvenated and ready to face the world. The sun was shining, and, after a toasty shower and a nice cup of OJ, it seemed like it was going to be a pretty decent day. My morning was quickly ruined, however, when I took my first step outside my apartment. Although I had braced myself for a chilly morning and a long day at work, I was not prepared for what happened next: I stepped into a ginormous pile of dog poop. First, the issue of your dog's health must be addressed here. What are you feeding this poor creature that enables him to create such a giant mess? Unless your dog is the size of a small pony, I see no reason why his byproducts should take up the entire sidewalk. Second, you are required by the City of Boston, and by yourself if you had even a hint of human decency, to clean up after your beast. I realize that carrying around a blue baggy full of dog excrement may not be the way you want to begin your day. But my patent-leather heels really didn't appreciate their squishy surprise. So come on, man, invest in a pooper-scooper! It may not be the season's top accessory, but I can guarantee that if I ever see you and your giant pooch sans scooper again, not only will you receive a piece of my mind, but a stiletto where the sun don't shine.

To the girl dressed like Nancy Drew on Halloween:

I saw you upstairs at Crossroads on Beacon Street a little after midnight on Halloween. At first, I thought you were dressed as a schoolgirl. But the paisley lunch box and Maglite really gave your costume away. While I appreciate a woman's right to dress like a sleuth-loving, prudey-pants, middle-schooler, shining a flashlight in people's eyes is not very considerate. I was trying to chat up someone dressed as the Sun-Maid raisin girl, and all you did was mess with my retinas and ruin my game. I know Nancy Drew may not have given up all her secrets so easily, but don't hate on a simple guy who was just looking for some Halloween tricks and treats.

The guy dressed like Joe Six-Pack

To the cab driver who emptied my wallet:

No, I did not actually mean to give you $14 for a $5 fare. I think we both know that. So the next time you see a girl wearing bunny ears and a cotton tail standing on the side of Comm. Ave. at 2 am, please remember that she is probably not in a state of mind to recall the fundamentals of her third-grade math class [while] looking at the meter. Taking advantage of innocent college students is just plain wrong. But whatever. I may be $9 poorer, but at least my karma is intact. I hope you get a flat tire.

On life with Asperger's and recycled trash

Odd Man Out

SOMETIMES IT'S HARD to know which came first—the crazy parents made famous by John Elder Robison's brother Augusten Burroughs, who ran with scissors, or the puzzling condition known as Asperger's. Robison suffers from the syndrome, which he chronicles in his memoir. Socially robotic and clueless, he relates awkwardly to people, while also showing remarkable talent in the mechanical and electronic realms. A dropout, he nevertheless manages to fashion exploding guitars for the band KISS and to develop computer games, aligning his oddball self with other musical oddballs in the "anxiety-filled, bright and disorderly world of people." Robison is 40, married, a father and well-paid before he's diagnosed with Asperger's. That discovery makes him understand, retrospectively, his preference for machinery over people, his tactless outbursts and his need to give weird nicknames—he calls his dysfunctional parents "Slave" and "Stupid" (both may be accurate). Diagnosis aside, Robison seems entirely human, affectionate and humorous as he puzzles over and contemplates his weirdo, yet successful, self. Fatherhood ultimately humanizes him, bringing his goofiness and geekiness comfortably together.

Amherst's John Elder Robison describes life with Asperger's in Look Me in the Eye.

Dumpanomics

IT'S NOT JUST THAT these grim times on the streets, Wall and Main, demand thriftiness. The fact is, the graciously named Wellesley Recycling and Disposal Facility has always been a near-boutique, even more so now. Gracefully curving roads lead to recycling stations divided into subcategories: This area takes clear bottles, that one green, another receives aluminum, then plastic bags and onto mixed paper, etc. Conscientious SUVs park politely next to each other. Another gigantic space, set way back, receives salted sand, screened compost, leaves, grass, and huge trees and branches. The giveaway (and receiving) zone often entices. "Decorated many a home, we have," says a cheerful volunteer, displaying chairs, sofas, ski boots. Most things are in respectable suburban shape. You'll find printers (presumably working), board games, microwave ovens.

A shelter serves as a library of sorts, with serious fiction, psychology, poetry and children's books.

A Real Boar

Picking a great bacon is like picking an MVP from an all-star squad; they're all gonna be pretty good. But one bacon, in particular, cooked the competition. Ron Savenor imports unsliced slabs from a Texas smokehouse, meaning breakfasters can carve strips as thin or thick as they like. The wild boar yields leaner meat than domestic pigs, but its woodsier, gamier flavor pairs perfectly with the gold-yolked duck eggs in the adjoining case at Savenor's.

Marc Orfaly reopens Restaurant L.

JUST AS THE landmark building housing Louis Boston has a record of notable occupants—from a natural history museum to Bonwit Teller—the restaurant space inside the Newbury Street store has showcased the work of first-rate chefs—including Michael Schlow (in its original incarnation as Café Louis) and, most recently, Pino Maffeo, whose Boston Public closed abruptly last year.

Currently it's a prime location, but with an uncertain future: Debi Greenberg, Louis Boston's owner, has said she intends to look for new digs when the store's lease expires in 2010. Nevertheless, the restaurant will quietly reopen by the end of this month under the direction of another talent: Marc Orfaly, owner of both Pigalle and Marco, and one of Food & Wine magazine's best new chefs in 2004.

"I want it to match the look and feel of the store," says Orfaly, who is so focused on the nitty-gritty of the business that renaming the eatery was very low priority.... Thus, it's Restaurant L again. He plans on continuous food service to mirror the store's hours. Orfaly describes the cuisine as "modern, eclectic" with "Malaysian, Vietnamese, French and Italian" influences. Also on the menu will be "the ribs à la Pino," he adds, referring to one of Maffeo's signature dishes.

LONG AGO, BEFORE ANYONE in Cambridge knew about greenhouse gases, Brattle Street was known as Tory Row because it was home to many British loyalists. This month a European-style cafe dubbed Tory Row, from the Miracle of Science folks, will take the place of the old Greenhouse Coffee Shop in Harvard Square.

THE FIRST ONE IS BY LAND, the next two are by sea: The Westin Boston Waterfront Hotel is now home to the second locations of MJ O'Connor's, the pub at the Boston Park Plaza, and City Bar, originally at the Lenox Hotel.

THREE TIMES A CHARM

Dorchester's Tavolo is another gem from Chris Douglass.

CHRIS DOUGLASS' MOST recent dining venue sits around the corner from the new Ashmont T station on the Red Line. Its name and cuisine suggest "tavola calda," an informal Italian eatery serving simple food at reasonable prices. While Tavolo does both, don't mistake it for a mere refueling depot. Indeed, it's a marvel of warmth and hospitality, from the cheerful greeting guests receive at the entrance, to the informed, friendly service provided by the waitstaff, to the colorful decor of the open-space design. Douglass' nearby Ashmont Grill, an immediate hit both in Dottie and beyond, rivals the loyal following he enjoys at Icarus, his 30-year-old South End gem. Tavolo proves that good things come in threes.

My meals began with an extensive sampling of the antipasti. These tapas-sized dishes, almost all priced at a few dollars, ran through the classic Italian repertoire. I enjoyed the rustic eggplant caponatina; roasted red-peppers with basil; Tuscan beans; broccoli rabe; and roasted head of garlic. I also tried the sopressata, a peppery sausage, and ended my antipasti tour with the white anchovies, mopping up the deliciously fishy oil with the restaurant's unremarkable bread. I passed over the half-dozen cheese selections, intending to return to them at the end of the meal, their proper place in Italian dining, but my eyes turned out to be bigger than my stomach.

Of the nine pastas that anchored the middle of the menu, I tried five, as well as an unlisted special—a polenta ($8, appetizer; $14, entree) that deserves a regular place on Tavolo's menu. It was formed, but soft and moist in texture, with an extraordinary sauce of shredded barbecued-pork, olives, basil and gremolata. Spaghetti marinara ($10) made up for its slightly overcooked pasta and bland sauce with two magnificent meatballs ($6), marrying beef, veal, cheese and well-herbed bread crumbs. The linguini with clams ($15) came al dente, beating out the spaghetti's texture, while the white wine, garlic and clam sauce was stunning in its classic simplicity.

Cavatappi ($14), a spiral-shaped pasta prepared al forno (baked in the oven) with chicken, mushrooms and cheese, could have used a more strongly flavored cheese or a heavier hand on the herbs to boost its timid flavor. However, garganelli ($13), a distinctive quill-shaped pasta from Modena (better known for its favorite son, the late Luciano Pavarotti, and its favorite machine, the Ferrari), arrived in a flavorful carbonara sauce of pancetta, egg and Parmesan, the province's most celebrated gift to the dining world. Finally, the pappardelle Bolognese ($16) combined broad, house-cut noodles in a meaty but bland sauce that didn't do justice to their velvety but resilient texture.

Tavolo could rest on its antipasti and pasta, but there was more. A grilled meatball panini ($8) was one of the highlights of my visits. The pizzas varied from the good quattro fromaggi ($11) to the terrific diavalo ($14), a delectable layering of pepperoni, salami and pancetta on a first-rate, thin crust. Even dessert, skipped in many Italian restaurants, scored high grades here with creamy gelato ($3 a scoop; $8 for 3), of which the pistachio earned top honors. A small but serviceable wine list included a grapey but well-structured Sangiovese di Toscana ($32), while draft beer was represented by Moretti ($4.75) and other perfect pizza pairings.

Tavolo's look and feel puts one in the right frame of mind to enjoy its food. Five rooster paintings, in contrasting red, white, blue and black, hang above the kitchen. Spherical light fixtures throw shadows on the blackboard-motif walls, decorated with children's stick drawings. Magenta window dressings keep the late afternoon sun at bay.

A true neighborhood restaurant, Tavolo attracts a diverse crowd of young and old, singles, couples and families, locals and curious Cantabrigians who visit to see what all the fuss is about. It's about tasty things to eat, a friendly atmosphere, good prices and courteous, attentive service. A recipe that makes it a keeper. ★★★

NO MAN'S LAND

Want to pick up girls? Go to a Coldplay concert.

I'M WALKING AWAY FROM the hostess podium at Johnnie's on the Side when a woman near the bar says, "Excuse me, are you that writer?" After confirming my occupation, her friend adds, "We didn't think it was you, because you were walking along looking so serious." The implication is that, because I occasionally take clown lessons or act lecherously while dressed as a baked bean, I should be zany at all times. In fact, I'd just learned there was an hour wait for a table, and my mood could be described as perturbed. So you want to know what I said in response? "I always hear that sometimes." Also, I'm always a moron sometimes. I should've yelled "Wucka, wucka, wucka!" pulled down my pants and run out the door. Then everyone would've had a better story to tell.

Despite my conversational ineptitude, I'm pretty sure I could've taken home both those women that night, along with every other woman at Johnnie's, including my wife, who would've been happy to oblige me. Why so confident? Because the females in that bar were about to have their emotional defenses atomized by the smooth-talk master nonpareil. They were about to get romantically entranced. They were about to walk into a Coldplay concert.

Have you ever watched The Pickup Artist on VH1? The premise is that a guy named Mystery, who wears mascara and fur hats, tells men how to pick up women. No, seriously. Because you should solicit personal-presentation advice from a guy who looks like a cross between Captain Jack Sparrow and pimp Don "Magic" Juan. Well, men, listen closely and listen good: The only obstacle to picking up women at a Coldplay concert is that after hearing "Fix You," you might become gay for Chris Martin yourself.

We have chick lit and chick flicks, and Coldplay is the musical equivalent. So what do we call a rock group that appeals primarily to women? Mammary-gland band? Is its performance a skirt concert? Obviously, we need to work on a catchy name for this phenomenon, because the demographic at the TD Banknorth Garden looked like a screening for Sisterhood of the Traveling Healthworks Membership. There were dudes there, to be sure, but they all looked like the guys you'd see wandering around, bored, at the International Flower Show or the Bridal Expo—physically present but with the glassy eyes that indicate intense mental activity devoted to monster trucks.

We have chick lit and chick flicks, and Coldplay is the musical equivalent.

Here's how you know you're at a chick concert: The lead singer pauses between songs to thank the audience for scheduling babysitters and coming to the show. The lead singer is married to the actress who starred in Shakespeare in Love. The band is British. The songs have lyrics like, "You'll flow down her river / She'll ask and you'll give her / Lips like sugar, sugar kisses." Chris Martin sacrifices puppies to Satan. Sorry, I had to throw that in there just to break the spell, lest all the women reading this miss their T stop while thinking up naked photos to send to Martin.

Let me be clear that I don't consider Coldplay a bad band. I don't dislike or resent the group simply because it's popular. I'm just sort of neutral. All the songs sound the same to me, except for "Viva La Vida," which I'm pretty sure is by U2. There was never a point in the concert when I wondered if they'd play a certain tune, because "Clocks"/"Speed of Sound"/"Yellow" all blend together into one piano-accompanied drum beat mixed with high-pitched crooning.

During one of those songs, Martin sunk down to his knees, leaning back until he was prone on the stage. To me it looked very calculated. Meanwhile, as he reclined, his voice climbed the register until he was emitting a teapot wail indistinguishable from the one being made by 10,000 ecstatic women in the audience. And if I sound jealous about that, I'm really not—when bikini-clad girls bathe on the beach, are we jealous of the sun? No; we celebrate the outcome. And in this case, the consequence was that any old, guppy-faced hobo who bellied up to the bar that night probably got dragged out and molested in the street by a crowd of sexed-up Coldplay groupies.

I'm sorry, Mystery, but I'm going to undermine your career right now with the only pickup line a guy needs to know: "Nice shoes—wanna go see Coldplay?" ✖✖✖

SIMPLE PLEASURES

House parties and other affordable amusements

ALL OF YOU KNOW that the current economic climate is going to change the landscape of America for many years. We're in the process of deleveraging society, paying down debt accumulated for decades by a government loathe to make tough decisions and by a public drunk on credit. Let me give you a little story about the Great Depression to put this current period in perspective. An older relative of mine was on Wall Street in the late 1920s, up to his young tail in the greed of the time, much like the dot-com bubble of this early new century. When prices crashed, there were reports of ex-stockbrokers selling apples in the financial district, of people waiting in line for bread.

My relative was a young married man in 1933, living with his wife on Riverside Drive in New York. "We were all in it together," he said. "It seems that everyone was broke. But, amazingly, although it was tough, we had good times. We saw friends a lot, and it was therapy, banding together for dinners and walks in the park. We had rent parties. The word would go out that a party was going to be held at such-and-such address. We'd show up, pay a buck at the door. There'd be all sorts of strangers, someone playing records. For a buck, you'd get spaghetti and meatballs, a salad, bread and all the cheap Chianti you could drink. We danced and sang and got drunk, and everyone always felt a lot better—because we were all in tough times together, and we hugged each other for warmth and friendship. It wasn't all bad." This story tells me a lot about the period we're entering and about how we can get through it.

It's a simpler era, a back-to-basics time when family and friends mean more than ever, when greed and conspicuous consumption are vilified. I foresee young people, new to the job market, moving home with their parents, not only to cut expenses, but to save money. This isn't necessarily bad; much that's good and joyful can come from it. In many ways, it can be a throwback to when generations lived together in one dwelling, or in triple-decker housing. I grew up, for the first five years of my life, in my maternal grandparents' house. Everyone got along just fine except for my father who couldn't stand my grandmother. But it was fun for me to watch because she couldn't stand him either. Every family is a soap opera. Mix one up in a single space, and it can be a sitcom as well. In this age of smaller families, you can learn a lot in such settings.

Outside the home, we can find simple pleasures in the city and in our daily lives. My first job in New York in a Wall Street training program paid an equivalent of $375 a week in today's terms. Around half of that went to rent in some semi-fleabag studio apartment with a tiny bathroom, shared with a neighbor I never met. Perpetually broke, I was forced to learn "scrounging," or how to discover various adventures for free (or almost free). Corporations gave presentations almost nightly for investors and investment firms. I would go to several a week, dressed in a suit and tie. I ate hors d'oeuvres and drank heavily at these meetings gratis.

This new society will similarly require using creativity to open doors. And it'll require hard work. I've asked a number of people how they've responded to the new economic climate, educating or amusing themselves on the cheap.

A comedy-commercial director told me, "Go back to the analog generation. Use your imagination to amuse yourself. This should include the sound of silence; distractions today often are masquerading as work." He also suggested pleasures that cost nothing, like Yahtzee, or even better "strip Yahtzee."

A public relations specialist said, "Potluck dinners with friends, riding bikes, going to public beaches and parks. Use reward cards instead of cash at CVS, Staples, Petco, Stop & Shop for frequent-flier miles. Call your cable company, and tell them you're thinking of leaving unless they give you some freebies."

Others have chimed in with various suggestions like, "Go on cheap dates and make a game of kissing in forbidden places like museums and libraries; carry an old-fashioned hip flask to drink from; have garage sales to get rid of all your unwanted crud; join AAA and get all sorts of things like free movie vouchers; take advantage of discounted memberships to the zoo, aquarium and Children's Museum; work out at the Y."

One of my favorite answers was from the woman who told me, "Well, I refuse to give up our country club. But starting last summer, instead of having the kids order food at the pool, I'd smuggle in peanut butter and jelly sandwiches, without the crusts."

Make mine chunky. ×××

ON PERKINS, POWE, SALTY AND BIG SEY

3 Uplifting Patriot Feelings

Oh, S ay Can You Sey... You forgot the effect that a healthy Richard Seymour has on a football game. It's OK, we were right there with you. Big Sey is the NFL version of a premier NBA shot blocker. Even when he's not racking up sacks, he's altering action all over the field.

Can He Kick It?... In two years, kicker Stephen Gostkowski's gone from the Pats' biggest question mark to an afterthought. He's more automatic than Tank Johnson's gun collection. In fact, when he comes out for a field goal, we usually run to the bathroom, the guy's that good.

*Written before the Jets game, and not responsible for any resulting jinx.

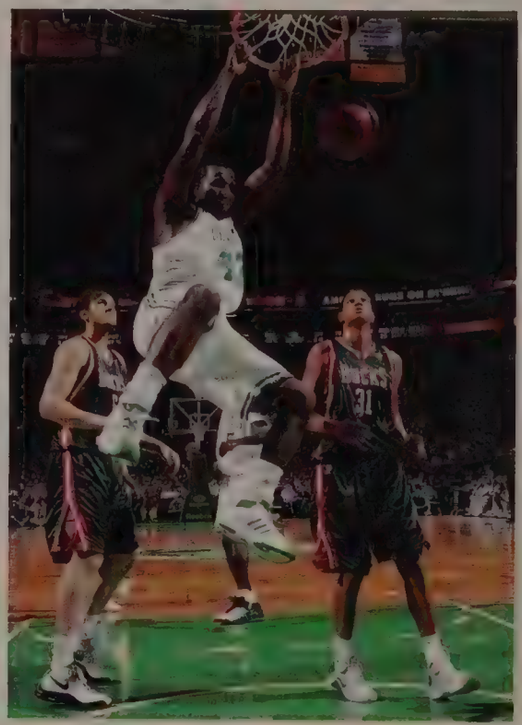
We Gotta Wear Shades... To ease the pain of losing the great Adalius Thomas, let's take another second to bask in the glow of Jerod Mayo.... Ahhh, that's good Mayo. If there's a pile on the field, you can be sure No. 51's on the bottom. They've done studies, you know—60 percent of the time, he's there every time.

5 EARLY CELTICS RETURNS

Perkin Hard for the Money... And just like that, Kendrick Perkins is a legitimate NBA center. A 10-point/10-rebound/two-block performance was once cause for celebration; nowadays it feels closer to the standard. Our boy's finally grown up, but we wish he'd enjoy it a little more. Perk's got two faces: scowl and scowlier.

Really, Really Good... Words can't describe what Paul Pierce has done this past month. But let's try a few: heroic, legendary, unforgettable... good 'ol online thesaurus. We honestly don't know what to say about Pierce's game right now, it's beyond description—well, at least in 50 words.

Truth Serum... This next point might sound somewhat contradictory, but Pierce's heroic efforts aren't free of charge. At press time, the Truth is averaging three more minutes a game than he did last year. The Celtics are 8-1, but honestly, who cares? We'd gladly take 6-3 and the knowledge that when April arrives, the captain's legs will be fresher than young Will Smith.



Viva Leon... Greatness shows itself in many forms on the basketball court. When it comes to taking a charge in the lane, Leon Powe is Muhammad Ali. He'd step in front of an Acela if it meant the Celtics got the ball, and then he'd probably apologize to the train. Long live the Leon era!

It's a Growing Problem... Complaining about officiating is like bitching about the weather: It doesn't change anything and it just sounds bitter. That being said, the NBA has a problem, and it's only getting worse. Somewhere out there, Tim Donaghy's laughing—not at the refs, though. He smuggled a Gallagher DVD into prison.

2 GUYS THE SOX SHOULD SCORE

Get Lowe, Lowe, Lowe... You always know what you're going to get from Derek Lowe—30 starts, 200 innings and 13-16 wins. So what if a couple drunken nights at Daisy's come with him? Ten million a year might be a little steep, but if the Sox can work it out, we'll be first in line to buy D-Lowe a round.

Pass the Salt... Three things you should know about catcher Jarrod Saltalamacchia: 1. His nickname is Salty. 2. He's actually married to one of his old high-school teachers. 3. The kid can play. Add those together, and we couldn't be more excited about the prospect of having the 23-year-old former first-round pick in town. He'll fill the catching void for a lot less than whatever evil number Scott Boras dreams up for Varitek.

4 DATES TO WATCH

11/21 The Celtics are in Minnesota to take on the Timberwolves, and it has to be said: The trade hasn't panned out, and someone needs to be held accountable. Every Sebastian Telfair assist is like a dagger through our soul.

11/23 It's a double-duty Sunday with the Celtics taking on the Raptors in Toronto while the Pats battle the Dolphins in Miami. Tempers will flare down South, but we're more excited for the fireworks north of the border—by the time KG's done with him, Señor Calderon's going to wish he was wearing pads.

11/27 Celebrate Thanksgiving with the Bruins, who are in Calgary to take on the Flames. A couple quick tips: Patrice Bergeron only eats dark meat; Tim Thomas likes extra gravy; and under no circumstances should you ask Zdeno Chara to break the wishbone. Seriously.

11/30 The last time the Patriots dropped a game at home to the Steelers we saw touchdowns from Sam Gash, Ben Coates and Dave Meggett. Clearly, it's been a while. So why will this Sunday be different? Trick question!

ONE MORE B'S SHOUT-OUT

We weren't prepared to have another winner on our hands, but this is Boston, what do you expect? Regardless of how deep your Bruins roots run, the Black and Gold are making themselves pretty hard to ignore. Throw "Bruins Stars" into a YouTube search and catch the fever. There's only one prescription...

STELLA ARTOIS

Perfection HAS ITS PLACE

A perfectly poured Stella Artois is the Gold Standard of Belgian beer.

Step One THE PURIFICATION

The bartender selects the signature glass for the beer being poured. The glass is scrubbed in a cool-water bath, preferably with a mild detergent. It's then rinsed with cold water to chill the glass.

Step Two THE SACRIFICE

The tap is opened in one swift motion to let the first burst of foam flow away. It must never enter the glass, thus ensuring every drop of beer is fresh.

Step Three THE LIQUID ALCHEMY

The glass is held at a 45-degree angle to create the perfect balance of liquid to foam.

Step Four THE HEAD

The head is created by straightening and lowering the glass. The foam is visually appealing and releases the beer's aroma.

Step Five THE REMOVAL

The bartender closes the tap in one quick action and moves the glass away from the faucet to ensure no drops spoil the perfect head.

Step Six THE BEHEADING

While the beer is flowing over the edge of the glass, the bartender cuts the head gently with a head cutter at a 45-degree angle. This eliminates the larger bubbles that burst easily and accelerate the dissipation of the head.

Step Seven THE JUDGMENT

The bartender now stands in judgment. The beer's head should be two fingers thick.

Step Eight THE CLEANSING

The bartender then rinses the bottom and sides of the glass. This keeps the glass clean and cool and makes it comfortable to hold.

Step Nine THE BESTOWAL

A perfectly poured pint of Belgian beer is presented with the logos of the coaster and glass facing the customer.

"State songs blow.... For Massachusetts, I'd do 'Amanda,' that great song by Boston."

Soroff On MO ROCCA

The Harvard-educated satirist on cross-dressing, Flomax and Larry King as cyborg

SELF-STYLED "FUNDIT" Maurice Alberto "Mo" Rocca first developed his skills as a political satirist, writer and comedian at Harvard, where he was president of the Hasty Pudding Club. Rocca, 39, later worked as a writer and producer for children's television, including The Wubbulous World of Dr. Seuss. But his break came as a correspondent from 1998 to 2003 on The Daily Show with Jon Stewart. He's now a panelist on NPR's Wait Wait... Don't Tell Me!, a contributor to CBS Sunday Morning with Charles Osgood and The Tonight Show with Jay Leno, most recently providing coverage of the presidential election, and a judge on the Food Network's Iron Chef America. He maintains a popular blog at Morocca180.com and lives in New York.

Jonathan Soroff: Define "fundit."
Mo Rocca: It's a fun pundit who's less bound by facts than the regular pundits, who aren't really bound at all. I actually brought that word into the vernacular and received no credit. Bill Carter of The New York Times ascribed it to someone else and Joy Behar called herself that on Larry King, but nowhere did I get credit.

Would you characterize yourself as a media whore?
Yes. Oh, definitely.

Are you the most famous Mo you know?
I'm the most famous Mo without an "e." I still don't have the Q-rating that Mo of The Three Stooges has, but I do have a far higher Q than Shep.

Who's your prediction for Hasty Pudding's Woman of the Year?
I think Olivia de Havilland, because 2009 is the 70th anniversary of Gone With the Wind, and she's the last surviving cast member.

In Hasty Pudding, what part of dressing up as a woman turned you on?
So much of it. But I'll tell you what didn't: the breasts. You could hear the water sloshing around inside.

What's the best use for a Harvard diploma?
Lining a litter box is interesting, because it's absorbent. But it's very thick, too, so if you run out of Styrofoam peanuts, you could use it to pack up delicate items.

Blogging. Is that something that can be cured with Imodium?
Actually, Flomax is better.

Or Gyne-Lotrimin, perhaps?
No. Y'know, some people believe blogging is caused by an enlarged prostate, but you just gotta take Flomax.

What do you wear to blog?
Something very loose.

A Maude-like caftan, perhaps?
Yeah, sometimes I'll wear a caftan. The problem with a muumuu is that I have one of those Aeron chairs, and it's very expensive, so if you get your muumuu caught in the gears, it's very costly to fix. If I'm writing something really fun and light, as opposed to the really, really heavy and profound stuff I blog about, then I'll wear something like a brightly patterned shift, sleeveless. Maybe something in an A-line. I love that. And I always wear flats.

Ever worry that one of your interviewees will just haul off and punch you in the nose?
The only time I really felt afraid was when I went to the Reform Party convention for The Daily Show. I was less afraid of getting punched than I was of people getting their handprints on my suit jacket. I was wearing this very beautiful cashmere and wool blend from Paul Stuart, and the idea of this Reform Party paw on me just... I wanted to vomit hot blood.

Your name is connected to The Wubbulous World of Dr. Seuss. How do you live with that?
Gosh, it's something that I'm always going to have to answer for. Whatever city I move to, I'm forced to register my address with the police because of it. It's very unfortunate. But all I can say is, I'm proud of my Wubbulosity. I'm here. I'm Wubbulous. Get used to it.

NPR is where old liberals go for mental wallpaper. How do you play to that?
It is. It's like liberal elevator music. I just put on my tote bag and try to be as biodegradable and fuel-efficient as possible. NPR makes me think of plantains. But right now, all I'm concerned with is how to make Barack Obama funny without creating a race war.

Larry King—is he being kept alive with unfiltered cigarettes, coffee and a stylist who says suspenders are OK without a jacket?
The suspenders are actually connected to a small, very powerful generator, right in the small of his back. That's why Larry was able to broadcast during the last big blackout. Y'know, people love to [rag] on CNN, but I don't know of any other network with cyber-anchors. What's going to happen when Chris Matthews short-circuits?

Is Charles Osgood actually a muppet?
Let me tell you. Even if you loved your grandfathers, you'd happily trade one in for him. He's actually available for that, too. You can rent him as your grandfather. He's my cult hero, actually.

Does he smell like cocoa?
Yes, very high-end cocoa in a mug. Never in a paper cup.

Do you have any desire to apologize to Teresa Heinz for calling her the Siren of the Serengeti?
Only if it's at one of her beautiful vacation homes.

Will you come to my house and judge an Iron Chef*?*
Sure. But the thing is, I'll eat anything. Mario Batali could cook a brick, and I'd love it. I really have no business judging anything.

Credit you're most proud of?
Probably the made-up ones on Wikipedia. That, or the book I wrote that no one read. It was a shitload of work, and I was too naive to know that people on TV don't write their own books.

Tell me: What's the state song of Massachusetts?
I don't specialize in state songs. State songs blow. "Maryland, My Maryland" is just an abomination. So I do songs about states. For Massachusetts, I'd do "Amanda," that great song by Boston. ✖✖✖

GREAT MINDS THINK

Bring yours to One Day University.®

We've put together an engaging, liberal arts day for people who like to think: great professors from Harvard, Yale, Columbia, and more, giving their greatest lectures—live.

One great day with four 70-minute lectures, including Q&A, on a variety of topics, and all guaranteed to stimulate your mind. Plus, there's breakfast and lunch.

Wellesley, MA
Babson College

Sunday, December 7, 9:30 A.M.–3:45 P.M.

SCIENCE
God vs. Darwin—America's Continuing Problem with Evolution

Kenneth Miller, Brown

Evolution is the cornerstone of biology, but it's under attack in classrooms and courtrooms nationwide. This lecture explores the battle and the scientific debate over intelligent design.

HISTORY
Revolutionary Characters—What Made the Founders Different

Gordon Wood, Brown

The election of Barack Obama is even more remarkable given that some of our first presidents owned slaves. Who were the founding fathers? Were they men ahead of their time or simply of it?

POLITICAL SCIENCE
The Impact of Media on Public Opinion & U.S. Foreign Policy

Matthew Baum, Harvard

Americans now get their information about the world from a dizzying array of sources. How does this influence their opinions? How, in turn, do their opinions influence foreign policy decision-making?

PSYCHOLOGY
Money, Happiness and Your Brain

Shawn Achor, Harvard

It's no surprise that the recent stock market decline and the bursting of the housing bubble have had an emotional impact on many Americans. But how closely is money really tied to life satisfaction?

Wellesley, MA
Babson College

Saturday, January 17, 9:30 A.M.–3:45 P.M.

LAW
Are Lawyers Subverting Criminal Justice in Our Courts?

Stephanos Bibas, Penn

Justice in America used to be a matter of public moral judgment. Now it's an amoral assembly line, which often takes place behind closed doors thanks to plea bargains and increasing caseloads.

ART HISTORY
Artistic Perfection and Political Treachery at the Acropolis

Fred Kleiner, Boston University

This lecture not only offers a deeper understanding of political treachery and intrigue in ancient Athens, but also lets students visually "walk" through the Acropolis at the height of Greek power.

PSYCHOLOGY
Understanding America's Depression Epidemic

Shelley Carson, Harvard

Depression is clearly on the rise in the United States. This lecture not only explores some of the surprising potential causes but offers ways to "immunize" against depression.

POLITICAL SCIENCE
The Politics behind America's Health Care Crisis

Michael Sparer, Columbia

Curious why every plan to fix our health care system has failed in the last 60 years? Learn why, and if a new president's plan has a chance.

Marine Salvage

Our writer plucks a sweatshirt from the sea and launches a fashion line.

By Jonathan Soroff
Photographs by Alan Gwizdowski

When I was young, I momentarily toyed with the idea of becoming a famous fashion designer. After all, what teenaged gay boy doesn't want to pal around with rich, famous people, remain in the closet and marry a beautiful heiress, yet still have unfettered access to all those smoking-hot male models?

The only sticking point: I'm hopeless at drawing. My skills as a draftsman begin and end with a straight line (circles pose a larger problem). That said, there are apparently plenty of brand-name designers who can't draw worth a damn. But there was another problem: I didn't really want to spend every waking moment being professionally fabulous and thinking up pithy, hip equivalents of "_____ is the new black." I can't imagine anything more boring or exhausting.

So I tossed the possibility out the window (along with youthful fantasies of becoming a bullfighter, Mother Teresa's right-hand-man or the next Warren Buffett). Until, that is, I had a revelation. I was on the beach when I came across something buried in the sand, and it rekindled the fantasy. As I'll explain, this epiphany was only partly tongue-in-cheek. I honestly saw it as an interesting way to engage in dialogue about what, exactly, fashion is, and why we follow it. I saw it as the intersection of style and performance art and myself as the provocateur.

I took my beach treasure to one of Boston's most forward-thinking boutiques—Stel's, on the last (often considered edgiest) block of Newbury Street. It's the kind of store that prompts people who have never been there to lie and say, "I love their stuff." All of the merchandise has a one-of-a-kind, "Oh-my-God-what-a-find" feel to it. There's something to appeal to every taste (if not every budget), without that desperate whiff of bowing and scraping to mindless trends. I showed owners Jon Callahan and Tina Burgos my "line" and asked if they'd launch my career as a fashion designer. Being fun, good-natured people, they agreed, and this is what we put in the store:

The sweatshirt pictured here, into which I sewed a label written in purple Sharpie, and onto which we pinned a price tag of $1,200. Next to it was a sign propped on an easel, announcing the launch of my maiden collection. On a nearby chair, I left a stack of my "fashion statement" that read:

MARINE SALVAGE

I was on a remote stretch of beach on Martha's Vineyard when I found this sweatshirt half-buried in the sand, below the high-tide line. Obviously, it had fallen off of a boat and had been there a long time: Parts were bleached by the sun, and others were still dark where the sand had protected it. There were a few small rips and holes.

I pulled the sweatshirt out (which took some fairly serious excavating) and brought it home. I cleaned it numerous times in the hottest setting on my washing machine. And I decided to launch a fashion line called Marine Salvage based on it.

It's not often that I find clothing on the beach, so this is the entire 2008 collection. That's also part of the reason why it's so expensive ($1,200). But more important, I'm charging for my collaboration with the sea. This hoodie was made by the ocean, even if it originally came out of a Russell Athletic factory.

As far as I'm concerned, the ocean produces more beauty than any human ever could, and I certainly have more respect for it than I do for most people, especially people I don't even know, like fashion designers who charge $10,000 for a dress or $50,000 for a handbag. For the most part, their clothing isn't constructed any better than thrift-store merchandise, either (not to mention, some stuff comes from sweatshops in underdeveloped countries).

If you agree, then perhaps you'll want to buy this sweatshirt (and if you do buy it, hopefully you'll be willing to talk to me about it). On the other hand, if this sounds like a bunch of horseshit, perhaps it's gotten you thinking about fashion and how clothing is made, and why we buy (and wear) what we do.

In either case, I'd welcome your thoughts in the Marine Salvage guestbook.

* * * * * * * * * * * * * * *

Next to the mannequin, I placed a notebook, figuring that if no one bought the thing (and I understand that $1,200 could probably get you a cashmere hoodie hand-crocheted by blind nuns in the Tyrolean Alps) at least I'd have people's reactions to the whole concept.

And react they did.

According to Callahan, nearly everyone who came into the store looked at the sweatshirt, and most of them admired it. More interesting, no one balked at the price... until they asked, "Who made it?"

"When they learned it was a found object, they were less inclined to pay for it, even though they weren't put off by the price initially.

"Men, more than women, are willing to pay more if something is made," he continued. "There has to be some technical aspect. What went into it? Why is the fabric better? They're willing to pay $1,000 more for a suit made of Super 150's wool instead of Super 100's. Is Super 150's better? Well, maybe, but not $1,000 better."

To illustrate his point, Callahan showed me a rack of Selvedge denim. Turning a cuff inside out, he revealed a negligible line of red stitching and said, "Guys will pay $100 more for these. It's a marketing ploy. The clothing industry comes up with these things, and then guys read in GQ that Selvedge denim is 'better' and 'worth it.'"

So is a $1,200 hoodie made by me and the ocean any more ludicrous?

One person expressed his or her opinion succinctly by writing, "Oh, please!" But then someone else added, "Interesting concept that I would pay $140 for." And a guy named Will Hoffman said, "Great vintage find! I would love to buy it for under $500."

Sorry, Will, but you will never see Marine Salvage marked down at a Filene's Basement or Marshalls. (H&M might be cool enough to offer a decent knockoff, though.) It's just too exclusive a line.

A savvier shopper wrote, "This is classic wear on Martha's Vineyard and may be found at 'Dumptique' [the free-for-the-taking 'boutique' on the grounds of the town dump] in West Tisbury or Edgartown. I bet people will pay for new clothes made from old fabric and consider it green and chic."

A pertinent observation. In a recent edition of his New York Times Magazine column, "Consumed," Rob Walker pointed out that Goodwill stores across America have repositioned and rebranded themselves as meccas for affordable fashion, and that "Goodwill Industries in the San Francisco area has worked with the Joe Boxer founder, Nicholas Graham, on the creation of a line of new clothes made out of discarded items, under the name William Good."

My favorite comment from a Stel's shopper, though, was the person who said, "If these threads could talk—imagine the tales they would tell! Swarthy seaman battles with bass and eventual shoreline washup!"

So at least one person really got it.

The sweatshirt is now safely back in my closet, and my foray into fashion design seems to have come to an end. But I will say this: Eat your hearts out, Domenico, Stefano, Dries, Nicolas, Giorgio, Calvin and Ermenegildo! I'll never have the fame and fortune you do. My name will never adorn the underwear waistbands of David Beckham and every hot gay guy at the gym. But when was the last time your clothing inspired someone to rip off a Gordon Lightfoot song?

Performing Pedigree

As Cirque du Soleil demonstrates, the French (and French Canadians) have trippy taste in acrobatics. Continuing the tradition, Aurélia's Oratorio comes to the Loeb Drama Center on Nov. 28. The show stars Charlie Chaplin's granddaughter Aurélia Thierrée under the direction of her mother, Victoria Thierrée Chaplin, who wowed Boston audiences years ago in Cirque Imaginaire. The one-woman show blends puppetry, clowning, illusion and physicality in a performance worthy of a Judd Apatow dream sequence.

Appaloosa ★★ ½ I've always figured that Westerns are like pizza or sex: Even when mediocre, they're still pretty good. As far as the genre goes, Ed Harris' second directorial effort aspires to be more traditional than other recent revisionist works like Deadwood or The Assassination of Jesse James. Harris stars as a quick-tempered gun-for-hire recruited to rescue the title town from Jeremy Irons' nefarious, marble-mouthed robber baron. This leisurely-paced picture, adapted from a novel by local institution Robert Parker, coasts on the laconic chemistry between the star and his sidekick, played by Viggo Mortensen, who delivers another odd, endearing performance as a gunsmith more philosophical than his profession might suggest. Conversely, Renée Zellweger is too polished and perky to provide the lewd sparks required as a mysterious widow aiming to tear these longtime partners apart. Harris is content to amble along this well-trod terrain, offering small pleasures in lieu of urgency. (In the suburbs.)

Body of Lies ★★ Much like Alec Baldwin, Russell Crowe is way more fun when he's fat. Excess poundage seems to bring out an intense actor's more playful instincts, and Crowe is a porcine, honey-drawled delight as the smirking embodiment of American arrogance in Ridley Scott's otherwise dreary espionage thriller. David Ignatius' knotty novel was adapted by The Departed screenwriter William Monahan. Once again, we've got Leonardo DiCaprio undercover and in over his head. Scott has never been much interested in storytelling, and Body of Lies is so busy with showy aerial photography and confusingly edited action sequences that the plot doesn't really kick in until about halfway through. DiCaprio tries to track down a terrorist while juggling the suspicions of a Jordanian intelligence authority (an excellent Mark Strong) and the demands of a tacked-on romantic subplot involving an Iranian nurse. Crowe steals the show from the sidelines, stuffing his face and all but begging for a movie of his own. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Burn After Reading ★★★ ½ Don't be fooled by the vibrant colors of Emmanuel Lubezki's cinematography or the giant cartoon performances of the cast, because Joel and Ethan Coen's follow-up to their masterful No Country for Old Men is every bit as bleak as its Oscar-lauded predecessor. It's just a heck of a lot funnier. For reasons too convoluted to explain here, Brad Pitt's exuberant himbo gym instructor tries blackmailing John Malkovich's boozy CIA burnout, with more than a few unforeseen complications arriving via George Clooney's sleazy lothario and Tilda Swinton as the world's meanest pediatrician. Shot, cut and scored with the ominous overtones of a paranoid thriller yet performed as broad farce for maximum dissonance, the Coens send all this silliness spiraling into bloodshed with clockwork precision. Like most of the movies from these gifted, dyspeptic brothers, Burn is secretly about the tragic smallness of people and the fatality of self-absorption. Every character is doomed by assuming they're more important to the plot than they actually are. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Changeling ★★ Clint Eastwood's latest directorial effort is a nasty little number. It's grueling and unpleasant in the manner of all late-period Eastwood, but it's missing the crucial moral uncertainty that marks his masterpieces. Angelina Jolie stars in this true story of a flapper-era single mom whose son is kidnapped and murdered. Five months later, the famously corrupt LAPD returns a boy who bears a slight resemblance, then banishes her to a mental hospital when she dares declare that this shorter little weirdo isn't actually her child. The outrageous injustice of it all doesn't escape Eastwood for a second. He's righteously angry, shooting Jolie in angelic silent-movie tableaux and casting the L.A. cops as sniveling, wormy toads. Jeffrey Donovan, the cut-rate Guy Pearce look-alike playing Jolie's grand inquisitor, lacks only a mustache to twirl. Every slightly interesting angle in this perplexing, James Ellroy–friendly tale of police corruption has been flattened out and oversimplified to the point of preposterousness. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

The Duchess ★★ Relatively painless, at least by the standards of awards-season chum, this overdesigned costume drama stars a too-modern Keira Knightley as poor Georgiana Spencer, a woman trapped in an arranged marriage to Ralph Fiennes' dreaded Duke of Devonshire. She's expected to produce an heir, and any paltry concerns like conversation are beside the point. A beloved fashionista and belle of the Whig Party, Georgiana's sprawling social life can't compensate for her domestic drudgery, especially after the Duke installs his mistress (Hayley Atwell) in a bedroom down the hall. The filmmakers pound

UNBREAKABLE BOND

The successful series reboot continues.

Quantum of Solace
Starring Daniel Craig, Olga Kurylenko, Mathieu Amalric, Jeffrey Wright, Giancarlo Giannini and Judi Dench. Based on characters created by Ian Fleming. Screenplay by Paul Haggis, Neal Purvis and Robert Wade. Directed by Marc Forster. At Boston Common and in the suburbs.

HOW FASCINATING IS IT that 2008's most inconsolable, borderline psychotic movie heroes are Batman and James Bond?

It's fun to watch pop icons shift with the tenor of the times, and while the Caped Crusader and Agent 007 once offered campy escapism, nowadays these fantasy figures have grown awfully grim. In Quantum of Solace, his second outing as Ian Fleming's suave super spy, Daniel Craig makes even Christian Bale's scowling Bruce Wayne seem like the life of the party.

This is a bitter bruiser of a movie, the bleakest mainstream blockbuster since… well, since The Dark Knight.

Quantum's 2006 predecessor, Casino Royale, is widely credited with bringing the Bond franchise back to basics, which is only partially true. Directed by Martin Campbell, the film slyly offered all the conventional pleasures of a James Bond adventure—exotic locations, hot babes, high fashion, luxury toys and outrageous action—but with a blunt emphasis on emotion and character development that made it feel light years removed from Pierce Brosnan's romps with space lasers and invisible cars.

Quantum is more ambitious and less successful, as it tackles the extravagant 007 traditions Royale left untouched and tries to wrestle them into a recognizable, politically savvy reality. It doesn't begin well. Picking up mere minutes after Casino ends, we discover Bond still reeling in agony after the death of his beloved Vesper (Eva Green) at the hands of a shadowy international terrorist organization.

Director Marc Forster is a peculiar choice for this material. He specializes in soppy, Oscar-bait melodramas like Finding Neverland or Monster's Ball and clearly has no idea how to shoot an action scene. The elaborate stunts, coordinated by Bourne specialist Dan Bradley, are visual muddles, as Forster's camera constantly shakes for no apparent reason and zooms in too close to get any sense of the spatial dynamics. The film's first 30 minutes hurtle from one set piece to another without any pause for plotting, which is more trying than invigorating.

But a funny thing happens once everyone slows down and is allowed to talk—Quantum of Solace gets interesting. Really interesting. Riffing on Fleming's original world-dominating cabal, Spectre, Paul Haggis' shrewd screenplay depicts a coalition of multinational corporations working to manipulate governments and hoard natural resources in underdeveloped countries. The CIA and MI-6 serve as oblivious patsies for the all-powerful conglomerates, while sinister Dominic Greene (art-house hero Mathieu Amaleric) gets away with murder by pretending to be a philanthropic environmentalist.

It's a scary new world order that forces Bond to go rogue after his agency is hamstrung by diplomatic deference to American oil interests. Craig charges forward, his shark-like spy always in motion, his ice-blue eyes locked in a murderous rage as he leaves a trail of rubble and bodies behind him. Jeffrey Wright returns as CIA sidekick Felix Leiter, but it's also a canny reprisal of his performance as Colin Powell in Oliver Stone's W., as he chokes back bile at U.S. policies he can barely stomach. He's got some brilliant, beery banter with Bond, both of them holed up in a Bolivian cantina swapping cracks about their mutual organizations' imperial follies.

The title is ironic, as there's precious little solace to be found. Olga Kurylenko provides the required Bond girl va-va-voom, but she's got a tragic history of her own and turns out to be even more hell-bent on vengeance than our hero. How appropriate that their relationship is consummated not with a sex scene, but by Bond teaching her how to kill.

Quantum doesn't always feel like a Bond picture, as it sacrifices the typical alpha-male fantasies for something a bit grittier and more unhinged. (One vicious homage to Goldfinger aside, most of the allusions are to Mike Hodges' nasty 1971 noir Get Carter.) When the third act ushers in the usual remote, impregnable fortress, the bow to convention clangs against the harshness of what's come before.

After the film, what lingers, besides the urge to whack the director with a rolled up newspaper, is the sheer pitilessness of its outlook. As in The Dark Knight, there's a deeply dismaying sense of a world without rules, and nobody is looking out for us, save for that damaged, sadistic maniac known as our hero.

I guess escapism ain't what it used to be. Our childhood idols grew up, and they got mean. ✖✖✖ home the historical parallels between Georgiana and Princess Diana, to the point where you can't help imagining a paparazzi pursuit of her horse-drawn carriage. With a contemptuous sneer, he plays the Duke not as a villain, but as a simple man suffering from such selfish tunnel vision that he responds to all the tears and ruined lives in his wake with surprised annoyance. (In the suburbs.)

I've Loved You So Long ★★ Despite a beautifully understated performance by Kristin Scott Thomas, writer/director Philippe Claudel's tearjerker is suffocated by its own coyness. Thomas stars as Juliette, recently paroled after 15 years in prison for a mysterious murder. Claudel tap-dances around this and many other revelations for most of the running time, dropping hints and insinuations and generally driving us crazy. Juliette's staying with her estranged sister (Elsa Zylberstein), yet the two siblings say little of import to one another, their tumultuous family history and the truth about Juliette emerging only in infuriatingly tiny dribs and drabs. Thomas is a marvelous, subtle performer. The film's lone pleasure comes from watching her reacquaint herself with the outside world as she slowly opens up through judicious use of body language and a dawning light behind her eyes. But the eventual "shocking" revelations prove pat and anticlimactic. I've Loved You So Long plays smoke and mirrors with the story because, were it told in a straightforward manner, there wouldn't be enough for a movie. (At Kendall Square and West Newton.) years, director Peter Sollett's follow-up to his endearing indie-hit Raising Victor Vargas turns out to be unexpectedly adorable. It's sincere and awkward where Juno was fabricated and crass. Michael Cera stars as a heartbroken teen bass player, a straight man in an all-gay punk band, the name of which cannot be printed here. Through a variety of convoluted circumstances, he finds himself stuck in a Yugo after a gig with Kat Dennings' insecure dreamgirl. They cruise the streets of New York City after curfew, meandering through misadventures and fumbling toward puppy love. Based on a young adult novel by Rachel Cohn and David Levithan, Nick and Norah exudes an uncommon sensitivity, patiently allowing these kids to mumble and make mistakes, so unlike their poised peers on film and television. As in Victor Vargas, there's a real delicacy to Sollett's direction, with an almost enchanted sense of late-night magic infusing his grungy East Village settings. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Point Blank ★★★★ The Boston Irish Film Festival brings legendary director John Boorman to town for a terrific retrospective. My personal favorite is Point Blank, Boorman's black-hearted 1967 masterpiece starring Lee Marvin as a ghostly force of nature headed back to L.A. after his partner (John Vernon) steals his wife and leaves him for dead. Mixing '40s film-noir tropes with innovations of the French New Wave, Boorman reshapes a straightforward revenge drama (adapted from a novel Donald Westlake wrote under his less reputable pen name, Richard Stark) into a brutal, psychedelic nightmare. The groundbreaking editing unfurls flashbacks within footsteps, as Marvin hovers in time, perpetually reliving one betrayal after another as he exacts his nasty, empty revenge. Marvin's stillness was never used to more chilling effect. Also watch for colorful supporting turns from Keenan Wynn and Carroll O'Connor. Point Blank spawned imitations both successful (Steven Soderbergh's The Limey) and less so (Mel Gibson's Payback), but there's no substitute for the real thing. (At the Brattle Theatre, Nov. 21 and 22.)

Rachel Getting Married ★★★★ Jonathan Demme's extraordinary new film transforms a weekend wedding party into a tapestry of jumbled humanity. Taking a cue from the late Robert Altman, Demme packs his frames with overlapping chatter and cockeyed conviviality. Cutting through the clatter is Anne Hathaway's revelatory performance as Kym, the bad-seed sister fresh out of rehab who hijacks the festivities with one narcissistic faux pas after another. The screenplay, by first-timer Jenny Lumet (daughter of legendary director Sidney), has a few tricks up its sleeve, including an old family tragedy from which Mom (Debra Winger) and Dad (Bill Irwin) may never fully recover. What's most miraculous about Rachel is how expertly Demme navigates Lumet's hairpin tonal shifts. The film swings from hilarious to crushing and back again, sometimes within the space of a single scene. There's so much joy in this movie—so much music and happiness spilling outside the frame—but also stark, unflinching pain. (At Coolidge Corner, Kendall Square and Waltham Embassy.)

Religulous ★★ Amusing, but in a way that's cheap and makes you feel sullied afterward, comedian Bill Maher's anti-religion film is a worthwhile concept botched in the execution. Traveling from trailer parks to the Vatican, Maher and director Larry Charles position themselves as skeptical crusaders preaching the gospel of rationality and science to folks who have little use for either. But zealotry is an easy target, and it doesn't exactly require a great deal of skill to make a creationist look like an imbecile. Maher's thesis, namely that some form of organized religion will catalyze the end of civilization, isn't entirely unreasonable. The problem is that the comic spends most of the movie riffing on addled lunatics who are no match for his formidable intellect, and a stale smugness sets in. Maher's invaluable HBO show finds him at his best because he's being challenged, and a braver, tougher movie would force him to debate reasonable people of faith, instead of just sneering at crackpots. (At Boston Common, Kendall Square and in the suburbs.)

Crimson Comeback

Leatherheads Even Ivy League scholarship takes a backseat to one of the nation's oldest gridiron rivalries as captured at the Brattle Theatre on Nov. 21 in Harvard Beats Yale 29-29. Directed by Kevin Rafferty, this documentary chronicles the legendary 1968 game where Harvard overcame a 16-point deficit in the final minute. It features interviews with former players from both teams, including Tommy Lee Jones. "Doonesbury" creator Gary Trudeau also joins the huddle for an evening of touchdowns and tackles that put his alma mater in the dog house.

Brett Boisvert

Slumdog Millionaire ★★★½ This blast of filmmaking exuberance from Trainspotting director Danny Boyle offers the year's catchiest gimmick. Jamal (Dev Patel) is an uneducated orphan from the slums who finds himself an unlikely contestant on India's version of Who Wants to Be a Millionaire. As luck would have it, every question serendipitously unlocks another flashback chapter in his wild, picaresque biography. With such a structure, The Full Monty writer Simon Beaufoy's screenplay can't help but err on the schematic side. But it's a thrilling experience nonetheless, thanks to Boyle's verve and commitment to sensory overload. Jamal's saga is Dickens by way of Bollywood with a touch of fairy tale magic. As the valiant young hero rockets from one dangerous scrape to another, even the ghastliest images of poverty are emboldened and energized with vibrant Technicolor hues. Will Jamal rescue his childhood sweetheart from the Fagin-like local crime lord? Can he win the 20-million-rupee jackpot? As the answers unfold, cinematographer Antony Dod Mantle cranks up the colors while Boyle blasts the bouncy music cues, all to thrilling effect. (At Kendall Square.)

Synecdoche, New York ★★ In his startlingly original screenplays for Being John Malkovich, Adaptation and Eternal Sunshine of the Spotless Mind, Charlie Kaufman merged depressive angst with absurdist whimsy to create his own genre: heartsick slapstick. His directorial debut, a grammar-nerd goof on my mom's hometown of Schenectady, is similarly ambitious but lacks any levity or momentum. The film is obsessed with the ways art cannibalizes life, the deterioration of the human body and finally the grim inevitability of death. Philip Seymour Hoffman stars as a sickly theater director attempting to make sense of his life by staging it as an ever-evolving theater experience, until he becomes so consumed with recasting and rewriting that he loses all trace of himself. It's a nifty metaphor, one perhaps more suited for a novel, but as a feature, Synecdoche is an unbearable grind that's relentlessly one-note, dingy and oppressive as you wait for everybody to die of old age. The movie is thrilling to discuss afterward, but torture to actually sit through. (At Kendall Square and Waltham Embassy.)

Vicky Cristina Barcelona ★★ ½ Though problematic and slightly sloppy, this pleasant trifle is Woody Allen's most consistent effort since 1999's loopy La Strada remake, Sweet and Lowdown. Rebecca Hall and Scarlett Johansson star as Vicky and Cristina, American postgrads spending a summer in Spain. Enter Javier Bardem's free-spirited Latin lover and stock stereotype, who probably would be risible

if played by any other actor. Bardem delivers his loosest, goofiest performance yet, embracing the role's mildewed clichés with contagious delight. Romantic entanglements and disentanglements ensue, complicated by stomach ulcers, girl-girl crushes and ill-advised rushes to the altar. The most fun comes from Bardem's ex-wife, a lusty psycho played in a movie-stealing turn by Penélope Cruz. Allen's direction is perkier and more alert than his recent work; he even moves the camera once in a while, soaking up the Barcelona scenery and gazing adoringly on his good-looking cast. Modest in both aim and accomplishment, it's hardly a return to form, but it'll do. (At Coolidge Corner and in the suburbs.)

W. ★★★ Hardly the comic hit-piece Dems were hoping for, Oliver Stone's curiously compassionate take on Bush turns out to be one of the legendary muckracker's most restrained pictures. Hewing largely to the historical record, Stanley Weiser's succinct screenplay runs on double tracks, alternating snatches of Dubya's wasted youth and born-again reformation with scenes from our long walk to war in Iraq. In the title role, Josh Brolin exhibits an uncanny mastery of the sputtering grammatical train wrecks and apish arm gestures that have made their mark these past eight years. It's bizarrely entertaining to watch Stone's blunt force dramatizations of those sinister cabinet meetings, with special scorn heaped on Toby Jones' Karl Rove and Richard Dreyfuss' subtly menacing Dick Cheney. As in his audacious 1995 biopic, Nixon, Stone can't help but muster sympathy for the devil. W. is the tragedy of a deeply shallow, arrogant man, who works out his daddy issues on an international stage. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Zack and Miri Make a Porno ★★★ Kevin Smith's first decent film in a decade conspicuously borrows current comedy hero Judd Apatow's stock company of actors. This makes a strange sort of sense, as the man-children and scatological sweetness of Apatow's The 40-Year-Old Virgin and Superbad owe enormous debts to Smith's do-it-yourself debut, Clerks. It's also just refreshing to see trained professionals handle Smith's unwieldy, overwritten dialogue as opposed to his high-school buddies or Ben Affleck. The hilarious Seth Rogen and a luminous Elizabeth Banks star as broke best friends attempting to make a stag movie for quick cash and discovering unexpected feelings once it comes time to perform. Sunny and optimistic even when wallowing in potty-mouthed filth (real-life porn stars Traci Lords and Katie Morgan play pivotal roles), the film is an unexpectedly heartfelt salute to the creative process. Zack and Miri fosters fond feelings for this makeshift family of slackers, who grow and prosper by focusing their energy into a productive endeavor, even if it's one that involves anal sex. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

ZERO GRAVITY

Wayne Shorter ponders film, philosophy and the jazz unknown.

CNN BUZZES IN THE background when saxophonist Wayne Shorter answers the phone at his L.A. home on the eve of Election Day. "It's going around and around, and occasionally you hear something," Shorter says of the campaign coverage as he turns down the TV. "You go in circles when you want to clean something, too. It's a cleansing thing."

Shorter, 75, tends to speak in circles as well. He's known for elliptical interviews that spin into philosophy and film trivia more than music theory or his legacy as a jazz pioneer with Miles Davis and Weather Report. But, occasionally, the listener will glean some enlightened wisdom that clearly translates into the bigger picture.

"Music is useless unless you see what the process of doing it means to human existence," says Shorter, who plays Berklee Dec. 3 with his quartet featuring pianist Danilo Perez, bassist John Patitucci and drummer Brian Blade. continued on page 81

ZAGAT AMERICA'S 1,000 TOP ITALIAN RESTAURANTS

RISTORANTE FIORE
Authentic. Italian. Cuisine.

250 Hanover Street • Boston's North End

We're stuck in our ways and proud of it.

We have been serving generations of families, locals and tourists in the North End since 1931. People crave the taste of our food. Some say their mouths water just thinking about eating here. That's why when we change even the slightest thing, they let us know it. Some things should stay just as they are.

He recalls a jazz club owner's reaction to a recent show: "The band was playing with a kind of hope that she had never heard or felt before. Then she looked at me and said, 'Are you lonely doing that, lonely going against the grain?' She went right to the nerve."

Shorter has gone against the grain for a long time. As a boy in Newark, he painted "Mr. Weird" on his horn case and performed with his brother in wrinkled suits, sitting backward on folding chairs and using newspapers as sheet music.

From that surreal, vaudevillian start, he went on to play with Art Blakey's Jazz Messengers and Davis' renowned '60s quintet with Herbie Hancock and Tony Williams. In 1970, he cofounded Weather Report with Davis alumnus Joe Zawinul, leading the fusion pack for more than a decade.

In his current quartet, Shorter has tapped a fresh, spontaneous musical language that reconfigures compositions on the fly. "Anytime someone does something unannounced, another type of person would say, 'I was expressing something, and you interrupted me and played right across what I was trying to do,'" Shorter observes. "We think of an interruption as an opportunity.

"You have to incorporate or draw on something called fearlessness," he continues. "Perfection is like viewing a statue. It's perfect, but it's the opposite of potential."

Perhaps the hope and freedom in the quartet's music will fit the Obama era. "When we're playing, I like everyone to have the chance to feel like they're president," Shorter says of his bandmates. He's also optimistic that younger generations are discovering and appreciating the music. "A lot of black kids—I thought they'd be into rap. A little kid 10 years old said to me, 'I liked the experimental stuff you're doing.'"

The quartet's usual opening piece is called "Zero Gravity" for a reason. "It's totally different every night," Shorter explains. "It's not something like going 'round 'Round Midnight,' and you ad-lib differently. This is everybody putting on the suit and getting into zero gravity."

Not that audiences should be daunted, says Shorter, who alternates between tenor and soprano sax as he weaves tart and sweet melodic threads toward open-ended resolutions. "People come up to us and say, 'There's a lot of fun going on up there,' which at one time would have been, 'We're not going to see these guys. I heard they're too deep.'"

> "She looked at me and said, 'Are you lonely doing that, lonely going against the grain?' She went right to the nerve."

Indeed, Shorter and his bandmates draw inspiration from thought-provoking books and movies. He cites Mindwalk, a 1990 film with Liv Ullmann and Sam Waterston. "There's some nice dialogue in this movie where these guys say, 'What are the molecules doing?' and she says, 'They want to connect.'"

He recalls how he and Davis, a fan of film and boxing, also connected to the cadence of John Wayne's and Humphrey Bogart's dialogue. "Miles would say 'Can you play that?'" Shorter recalls. "Some of that stuff that Miles was playing, now that I'm thinking of it, also sounded like the motor of [his] Ferrari. And he'd play notes as if he were boxing."

A car engine and boxing: two other influences that build on circular motion to create a desired effect. "Jazz is just a synonym for creation," Shorter says. "Let's go into the unknown, because 'into the future' sounds too elitist." ✖✖✖

Still Popular

Get Lucky If Nada Surf's '90s hit "Popular" lingers fondly in your memory, catch the group at Paradise Rock Club on Dec. 2. The New York trio has returned to their indie-pop roots—proving that their talent and creativity never ran out of steam. The band revisits its heyday with the release of Lucky, their fifth album, recorded with special guests Ben Gibbard of Death Cab for Cutie and Martin Wenk of Calexico. Lucky, indeed. For the holidays, Nada Surf also releases Vinyl Box Set 1994 – 2008, a compilation of studio albums, B-sides, and a book with lyrics and photos. Thais Collins

CALITERRA
CAL-ITAL BAR & GRILLE

Dine. Drink. Dish.

Caliterra, a unique and innovative concept in casual upscale dining, is newly revitalized by Chef Julia Brant's comfort classics cuisine. Enjoy tantalizing cocktails and an extensive wine list matched with the new menu.

The dining room is perfect for lunch and dinner seven days a week, and is welcoming with original terrazzo flooring, warm amber lighting, and a beautiful private dining room evoking images of a wine tasting room in Sonoma.

Call to book your next private event in Caliterra's Wine Room, accommodating up to 18. Caliterra also welcomes events up to 150. Please call for more details.

Caliterra has earned high praise for both the new menu and the service, receiving "Absolutely Two Thumbs Up" from TV Diner, New England Cable News.

"I wish to be a ballerina."

Cassandra, age 3

Cassie always wanted to be a ballerina.

Thanks to Make-A-Wish® volunteers she got her wish and danced with a troupe of ballet dancers. For a few precious moments, Cassie forgot about her life-threatening medical condition. She will never forget the people who helped make her wish come true.

To make a donation, become a volunteer, or refer a child, call the Make-A-Wish Foundation® of Massachusetts at 617-367-WISH (9474).

We all have the power to grant a wish.

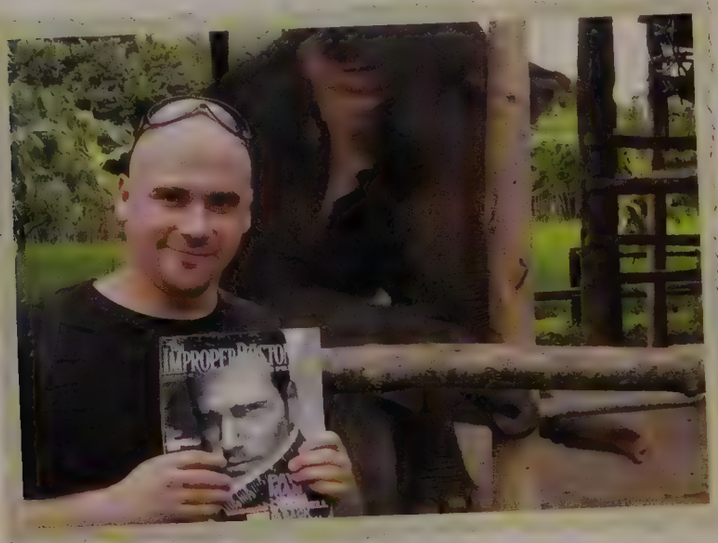
ATTENTION BOUNTY HUNTERS! BONUS POINTS TO ANYONE WHO CAN CAPTURE AN IMPROPER READER HITTING THE GROUND AT THE WORLD DUCK-CALLING CHAMPIONSHIP HELD NOV. 29 IN STUTTGART, KAN.

Unlike the rest of your friends, we want to see the photos from your next trip. Where did you take us? Send us a picture of you or a buddy or, better yet, someone famous reading THE IMPROPER BOSTONIAN and tell us where you were. The wilder your destination and the more creative your photo, the better your chances of making the cut in the esteemed IMPROPER Sightings.



On a recent trip to Thailand, Erez Pasternak introduced us to the actual elephant from the 1995 smash hit Operation Dumbo Drop. That's right, "Ladies and gentlemen... it's Ray Liotta!"

Nicole and Greg Morse celebrated their wedding with THE IMPROPER in Hyde Park, Vt. Aw, man, does this mean we have to give them a present? When does it stop?!

While in Kenya, David and Robyn Galpern, Jennifer Kent and Thanh Truong posed on this bridge overlooking a hippo feeding area. They said it was a race, a chase and that each hippo hurried up and fed its face.

Governor Deval Patrick read our mag from cover to cover on election night. Despite what Patrick says, it's not our fault he missed Barack Obama's acceptance speech.

How Does That Shoe Taste?

Figuratively speaking, the roof, the roof, the roof was on fire at the gala held at the Cyclorama to benefit the Wellspring House. (Apologies to Rock Master Scott and the Dynamic Three; the royalty check is on its way.)

Under One Roof attracted a high-octane crowd, including banking behemoths John Hamill and Chad Gifford, his über-fabulous wife, Anne, and daughter, Jessica Busch, son of a speaker man Tom O'Neill, do-gooding sneaker heir Dan Fireman, advertising Goliath Mike Sheehan, and honorees Sean and Kerry Healey, Melinda Marble and Nancy Schwoyer, who nibbled on hors d'oeuvres, dined sumptuously and bid generously in a live auction.

Overheard during the cocktail hour: One guest was describing an IMAX movie she'd seen, saying, "Those weird things that live on the bottom of the ocean floor in complete darkness," to which her friend replied, "Sounds like most of my exes."

However, the most amusing comment came from a man who, upon being introduced to a woman, was asked about his girlfriend's whereabouts.

His response: "This is my girlfriend… Kevin."

Does This Make Me Look Fat?

Despite the somewhat glaring irony of hosting a dinner to fight eating disorders, MEDA's annual gala, held at the Copley Plaza, was a swanky affair.

The lovely evening began with cocktails and a silent auction, then continued with dinner in the ballroom. "I wonder what they're serving," joked one guest. "Probably a vitamin and some Ex-lax."

Truly tasteless comments aside, it was an elegant gathering to benefit an important cause. It also provided an opportunity to rub elbows with such super-sparkly people as Caroline and Bill Balz, John and Eline Sharp, Rob and Heather Earl, Pascal and Irina Aguirre de Navarre, my ex-shrink Judy Strull (she's very good, but apparently I'm a lost cause) and one woman who said, "This is probably the only party where I feel fine being fat." Proving just how necessary the evening was: The guest in question was maybe a size 2.

Wyc and Corrine Grousbeck at the Championship Celebration

Oops!

The vertically challenged might have wanted to wear shoe lifts when the Boston Celtics Shamrock Foundation hosted the Championship Celebration at the Renaissance Boston Waterfront Hotel.

In addition to the pro b-ballers, pretty much every big player in the city was there, including team owner Wyc Grousbeck and the stunning Corrine, fromage grand Steve Pagliuca, the entire Epstein family, investment giants Jim Pallotta and Peter Lynch, nightlife kingpin Patrick Lyons and the gorgeous Kristina, babe-a-licious blonde Beth Weir, radio blabbermouth Greg Hill, radio goddess Julie Kahn and her main squeeze, Dan Scully, and celebrity chef Michael Schlow, who loaned me 40 bucks because I forgot my wallet. (The money is in the mail!)

The evening's highlight: While he was on the phone, PR czar George Regan's sidekick, gorgeous marathoner Corey Smith, bid on a skybox package in the live auction. "I got it for eleven-hundred dollars!" Smith said proudly, before someone pointed out that she'd bid eleven-thousand dollars. Now that's what we call an expensive date.

No Drinking on the Dance Floor…

The young and the guest list were out in full force for Take It to the Max, a mixer to benefit the Max Warburg Courage Curriculum, held at the Epicenter.

The crowd of newly minted movers and shakers included banking scion Fred Warburg, event chairs Eliza Brown (with her sister, Katherine), Katherine McManmon and Kristen Sullivan, the enviably good-looking Parker Treacy, incorrigible scamp Bill Deacon and one attendee who said, "The last time I saw this many bow-ties was at a Louis Farrakhan rally."

My condolences to the girl on the dance floor who got red wine spilled on her. Here's hoping the dry cleaner worked some magic. ✖✖✖

Chill Out

Winter arrived early this year, prompting complaints office-wide. Some people are better equipped to deal with the season than others. "Do you hate the cold?" one colleague asked suspiciously as I struggled with my zipper. "I broke up with a woman who constantly complained about it."

"Not if I'm on the slopes," I replied, a sentiment that pays off in New England. I've lived in Chicago, where the flat plains do little to make the freezing temperatures more bearable. I'm not going to lie. Spring skiing in Utah is my ideal.

But back in Boston, there are countless ways to take advantage of the icy conditions. In this issue, we introduce three lesser-known sports: skijoring, snowkiting and winter peak-bagging. Then there's frostbiting, or arctic sailing, which Ezra tried firsthand. All four activities are for the truly outsdoorsy.

For those of you who prefer to stay inside, I suggest catching a Bruins game. Cover guy Patrice Bergeron looks amazing after 2007's season-ending injury. The entire team is providing yet another reason to welcome winter.

The Iceman Cometh

DRIVERS' ED

PAUL LAWRENCE practiced for weeks in a skating rink in the North End before appearing in front of thousands of Bruins fans at TD Banknorth Garden. When his assignment finally arrived 12 years ago, the ice was badly marked, cracked, rutted and uneven. Conditions couldn't have been better.

Lawrence, 46, is a Zamboni driver. "It's an honor to be able to do this," he says. "I was definitely nervous the first time I drove in front of a crowd. Now I don't even notice. I concentrate on what I'm doing. I'm not the show." Perhaps more so now that the Bruins look like real contenders.

But for Lawrence, the most technical as sinking a puck in the machine he maneuvers around the Garden as many times on game days is officially called a resurfacer. A blade cuts a fraction of an inch off the ice; a water jet cleans the exposed surface, then a second jet applies another layer. NHL rules require about an inch of ice, he says. Keeping it level also helps the Celtics, he adds, because the ice remains on the floor throughout the winter season, with the parquet installed above it.

Invented in the 1940s by Californian Frank Zamboni, the resurfacer is difficult to drive. Lawrence admits. Harder to overcome is stage fright, an emotion regular folks can experience by giving $150 to the Boston Bruins Foundation. The donation comes with a ride on the "Canadian Hoover," as Lawrence affectionately puts it—an experience that often leaves first-timers feeling

They can't believe what it's like when they get into the arena and all the people are out there," he says. "It does seem like all eyes are on you."

Drink of the Moment

Never Too Late

A drink called Never Say Never sounds like something downed on a dare or by a Bond villain. It should be shaken by Dr. No, served with a fugu garnish, or, in this case, born from genuine surprise. "Until recently, I was primarily a vodka drinker," says creator and bartender Tommy Giammanco. "I said I would never, ever drink gin."

The change of heart came through cutthroat competition. Every quarter, the bartenders at Radius mix possible combinations for the seasonal menu. "There are some pretty big prizes, so there is some underhandedness," Giammanco reveals.

The gin-based Never Say Never ($14) was just one of his eight entries—"You have a better chance of winning if you make more cocktails"—and began with a cream base, which was soon removed. "Cocktails evolve," Giammanco says, "I'd be more inclined to order something without cream than with it. It's a bit of a commitment."

After consulting with fellow competitors and higher-ups like chef/owner Michael Schlow, fresh OJ was picked to complement the burnt blood-orange notes of New Amsterdam gin. The addition of strawberry liqueur signals the season, as more viscous liquids welcome winter.

The result is a juicy concoction—the martini you'd mix after some rigorous apple picking. A final touch of red jalapeño adds spice that builds as the slivers steep. "The cocktail, itself, as you're drinking it, is an evolution," Giammanco concludes. NICK ALTSCHULLER

ASK THE EXPERT

JOAN SALGE BLAKE MS, RD, LDN
NUTRITION ASSISTANT PROFESSOR BOSTON UNIVERSITY

Q: HOW CAN WE EAT HEALTHILY ON A BUDGET?

With food prices going in one direction—up—Bostonians have been feeling the pinch at the supermarket. The good news is that healthy foods can still be affordable with some savvy strategies. Here are five easy ways to cut costs, but not nutrition, from your shopping budget:

1. Don't pay extra for anything you can do yourself. Wash your own romaine lettuce rather than buying the pre-washed variety. Savings: ~$3/lb
2. Bypass the bag of baby carrots and reach for the bag of whole carrots. Savings: $2
3. A visit to the deli counter will give you sticker shock. Cook a turkey breast for dinner on Sunday and use the leftovers for weekday lunches. Savings: ~$6/lb
4. Buy your oatmeal in the old-fashioned drum rather than the pricey individual packets. Savings: ~$3/lb
5. Go canned. Canned pineapple chunks are a bargain compared to fresh pinneapples. Savings: ~$2.50 TARA GORMAN

Good Eats

Bowled Over

Nobody does cold better than the Russians. See for yourself with a crock of borscht at Café St. Petersburg in Newton Centre. More of a refined consomée than a traditional stew, owners Ludmila and Natan Slezinger's version sweetens an otherwise beefy broth with julienned strips of beets and carrots. Sop it up with slices of brown bread or, better yet, savor it alongside bites of meat-stuffed pirozhok and sour cream. Wash it all down with some house cranberry vodka. ELIZABETH BOMZE

Wash Away Your Sorrows

Because no wine can end a funk more quickly than Champagne, now is the time to pop a cork. Bubbly is so civilized, it makes everything seem better: food, company, even prospects for future employment. Better yet, prices have declined slightly from their peak earlier this year. Another plus: When Champagne sales slow, producers put older "reserve" wines into their non-vintage blends, enriching the flavors and textures. These recent blind-tasting winners are all family-owned.

Bruno Paillard "Première Cuvée" Champagne, Brut NV ($49.99, Bauer Wine & Spirits, Boston)
This great boutique producer's NV is a bit more delicate and light on its feet than the last time we had it, offering fresh apple and graceful lemony scents. It's creamy and soft on the palate, with a touch of peanut-like spice and a long, satisfying finish accented with white pepper. An aperitif style, it's a great choice for canapés, sushi or raw shellfish.

Henriot Champagne, Brut NV ($42.99, Wine Emporium, Boston)
Made from a blend of 60 percent pinot noir and 40 percent chardonnay, this crowd favorite has the full complement of toasted, earthy, baked bread and tangerine citrus aromas that come from long aging on the yeast. It's also fuller on the palate, with a well-rounded red-apple flavor, invigorated by clean, slightly bitter lemon-peel undertones in the finish. Nicely balanced, this pairs swimmingly with fish in creamy sauces.

Roederer "Brut Premier" Champagne, Brut NV ($54, Brix Wine Shop, Boston)
From the renowned producer that brings you Cristal, the Roederer Brut is our overall winner. A non-vintage with the class and finesse of pricier bottlings, Roederer is among the few houses that control a majority of the grapes that go into their blends, an ensuring consistently reflects outstanding quality. This year's version has a dry but silky character, with alternating vanilla, lemon and cream flavors. It's a sensual Champagne, lush on the palate, but also tangy and well-balanced. It's a wonderful gift for lobster lovers.

Going Out

COUNTER BALANCE

Drink staked their claim. With newly opened Sportello, Barbara Lynch and Co. begin phase two of their Fort Point expansion.

Italian for "counter service," the eatery finds core inspiration from Lynch's long-ago stint at a Brigham's diner. The sparsity and efficiency appealed, and those elements mark the decor. A dark cork floor provides the base for an airy space of white walls, orb light fixtures, pristine Corian countertops and massive bay windows. It's all very bright and aseptic—Edward Hopper's "Nighthawks" meets Stanley Kubrick's 2001.

The food is signature Lynch, geared toward time-pressed diners. Fortified with selections from the downstairs bakery and specialty retail products, options include chestnut bisque ($12), Russian salad with rabbit ($12), flatbreads and pasta dishes, featuring former No. 9 Park items like tagliatelle ($17).

"It's simple Italian," explains executive chef and No. 9 expat Colin Lynch. "We wanted to make it easy for people to get in and have a quick lunch and also provide stuff that wasn't really available. You can't go out and find these kinds of lunch places."

Sportello adds dinner service this week. "We're not going to try and complicate things just because it's dinner," Lynch assures. "We'll have more entree-style meats and fish, but it's a kitchen built for speed, so we're going to try and pack as much flavor with as few ingredients as possible."

LIP SERVICE

As retail tanks, the cosmetics industry takes off. It's known as the "Lipstick Theory"—the statistically proven concept that in times of war, recession and depression, women seek solace in small luxuries. Put simply, it's easier to justify $20 on a tube than $200 on a tunic right now. Lucky for us, lip color has come a long way since 1929. Enter the new recession with style and grace in these four glosses. At the very least, they'll keep you from frowning.

MORE THAN FRIENDS

TO A GOOD FRIEND: I realized too late that I like you as more than a friend, and I'm sorry I never said anything when I had a chance. I just want you to know that during the last several months, which have been some of the most difficult of my life, you kept me smiling and helped me not take myself, and life, too seriously. I know I've been an absent friend, but please realize that it has nothing to do with you and everything to do with me hoping not to fall in love with you. I can say without malice or ulterior motives that I wish you and your girlfriend all the happiness that you both deserve. I hope that one day we will be friends again.

A good, heartbroken friend

To the adorable accountant with the impeccably-shaped eyebrows in the Financial District on Nov. 10:
You were standing on the corner of Washington and Winter streets eating a hot dog like it was your last meal. I was meeting with a film producer at the food court, hoping to find our next winning project. What I think I found was our next leading lady—maybe my leading lady. When I introduced myself, you smiled and your eyes lit up like a three-carat diamond from De-Scenza's. Heck, after you explained the meticulous details of your latest Excel spreadsheet report, I thought of stumbling into the Jeweler's Building and buying you a massive gem. So will you? I know we created a huge spark that could make Bonfire of the Vanities look like a Girl Scout with a sparkler. Drop me an e-mail at mitchmitchell24@hotmail.com. I will take you for perpetual Fenway Franks. We can make an Academy Award–winning film and then drink strawberry daiquiris with Hollywood starlets and bookish number crunchers.

Anonymous

To the eavesdropper at the next table:
I had been out of town over the weekend and had a lot of catching up to do with my best friend upon my return. We didn't anticipate that doing so at a restaurant would include intrusive weirdos like yourself. Basic social graces include not relentlessly staring at the two girls seated at the next table while they discuss important personal information over flatbread pizzas. Even if you don't have a life, that doesn't mean you're invited to passively participate in ours. Mind your manners.

Creeped out

Dear pedal pusher:
I respect that it's 20 degrees out and you still have the motivation to bundle up, hop on your Huffy and cruise down Mass. Ave. But seriously, a red light means stop. While the concept may be too difficult for your frostbitten noggin to handle, I'm the one with the walk symbol, not you. I already have enough on my plate trying to cross the street without being taken out by a Hummer H2; the last thing I want to hear is your squealing brakes and vain attempt at yelling, "Look out!" as you careen through the intersection at 30 mph. Just because you're sporting fixed gears and two wheels doesn't exempt you from the rules of the road.

Botox Nation

PRETTY, WITTY AND STILL below the timber line of visible aging, Beth Teitell's new book explores the industries whose products and services supposedly throw an axe at the clock. Wrinkles, plumpness, split ends, the slouching bod; their victims are all desperate, rather credulously so, to buy remedies. Teitell isn't immune to such despair, panicking that a $600 haircut will grow out too fast. Then there's the experiment with Renova, which involves slathering cream on half her face, causing her to fear freakish results à la Phantom of the Opera. She also worries about slumping after a "global body" session with Boston posture guru Zayna Gold, leading to a dowager's hump, a potbelly and "a double chin even." Even! She teeters between her fear of time's winged chariot and her suspicion that lots of high-price surgeries, lotions and their proponents are profit-driven and suspect. Because she finds attitudes that work as well as potions, Teitell's own philosophical skin line should be named "Irreverent Sparkle."

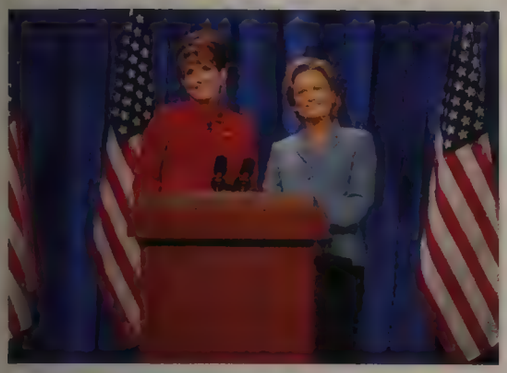
NATURE CALLS BE A BUTTERFLY ON THE WALL.

All Aflutter

AN OUTDOOR PLEASURE, butterflies undergoing their magical transformations can be found indoors at the Museum of Science in wondrous concentration. In a passionately hot room crammed with plants and flowers, these creatures—reminiscent of miniature birds or toy helicopters—flicker gracefully. It's incredible to think they've gone from crawly caterpillars, to pupas encased in chrysalises, to one of the hundreds of beautiful species of butterfly. Bright, silky blue ones resemble soap bubbles, while others, including the Malay lacewing, look like intricately stitched Oriental rugs. Do bring a magnifying glass! The familiar orange monarch bears the brushwork of some celestial artist. Another butterfly has a doleful, almost creepy, eye-shaped pattern, like a mythic seer, to ward off predators. The luna moth, not looking like your pesky, little sweater-eaters, is a graceful, pale-green lady with delicate long legs who lives just one week. This place is a meditative heaven.
The Butterfly Garden at the Museum of Science (1 Science Park, Boston; 617-723-2500; mos.org) is great for all ages.



Question for Norm Laviolette

How does an aspiring comic go from Boston to Saturday Night Live, like new cast member and BU alum Michaela Watkins?

Norm Laviolette co-owns Improv Asylum.

If you want to get onto Saturday Night Live, you need to find where improv and sketch comedy are being done near you and get into a training center or class. SNL typically hires actors with heavy improvisational backgrounds. Many people think, "Hey, I'm funny, I can do that," when they watch SNL. What they don't realize is that those actors have spent years, sometimes decades, learning the skills it takes to be a member of a comedy ensemble.

Most actors start in an improvisational training center, [where they] learn the ideas behind improvisation. When professional comedians improvise, yes, they are making it up on the spot, but they're also using a finely-honed skill set that allows them to communicate at lightning speed, process information from their scene partner and make choices in less than a second. In Boston you have two very good training-center options: Improv Asylum in the North End and ImprovBoston in Cambridge. Other nationally known [options] are the Second City and the Annoyance Theatre in Chicago, Upright Citizens Brigade in New York and the Groundlings in L.A. [where Michaela trained].

Success in the training center positions you for cast auditions. And once you get into a cast, then the learning really accelerates. As a cast member of the Improv Asylum mainstage, you'll do a minimum of six shows a weekend for sold-out audiences, on top of innumerable rehearsals, side shows, tech runs, video shoots and whatnot. You learn how to improvise professionally, write sketch comedy (which is what SNL is), work with scripts, write funny songs and generally become an all-around performer. Members of Improv Asylum have gone on to the Second City in Chicago (Brian Gallivan) and the Groundlings in L.A. (Lisa Schurga and Ryan Gaul). Right now, these are the primary hiring grounds for SNL. On the national scene, Boston comedians are generally held in high regard. Other highly-regarded local troupes are Out of the Gutter in Fall River and Bastards, Inc., in Cambridge.

Nick and Choose { NICK ALTSCHULLER }

FIRST BLOOD

Nick gives until it hurts.

THERE WAS A BLOOD DRIVE next to my apartment, and, as always, I passed by with no small sense of guilt and regret. I know the statistic: Area hospitals need thousands of pints just to meet daily needs. And I know the slogan, "Have you saved a life today?" Both appeal to my desire to feel heroic. I'm just hamstrung by something far more basic.

I have a problem with blood. On a first-grade field trip to the hospital, a towering fridge of the stuff knocked me on my OshKosh B'Goshes. Later, athletics was my excuse, but after hanging up my cleats (and apparently forgetting my past), I was first in line to donate. Didn't even make it past the finger prick. With my head between my legs and a wet towel on my neck, I thought, "I'm the son, grandson and great-grandson of doctors," "This shouldn't be happening," and "Can I still get the free pizza?"

Fear is the wrong word, because it's inaccurate, and it makes me look bad. Giant spiders are scary, and every part of me believes as much. But with blood, my systems shut down involuntarily, even as my inner voice shouts like Gunnery Sergeant Hartman: "What is your major malfunction, numbnuts?"

Resolved to find out, I turned to renowned Harvard psychology professor Steven Pinker. In an e-mail carefully worded to blend obsequiousness with the fact that I'm a big, brave boy, I explained my predicament. "Your reaction is common," Pinker responded. "My understanding is that this is a reflex that probably evolved to help stanch one's own bleeding: If you see blood on or close to your body, your body suddenly reduces your blood pressure, which means less blood gushes out of one's wound." Meaning my body has a highly-tuned defense system, which is extremely badass. Could a mantra help keep me focused? "I don't know about mantras," Pinker wrote. "I look away and try to think about something else, which seems to work passably." Not what I hoped for, but at least I wasn't alone.

On donation day, I walked to BU and felt my hands cool as my blood shifted to cower in my torso. Before the screening test, I suggested that I might do better lying down. "Oh, no," the nurse replied, "This is just where I prick your finger." Exactly. As she rolled my finger pad like a dough ball, I felt unplugged. Before the lights went out, I employed the Pinker Plan and threw the blinders on. It worked passably, which was all I needed.

At the donation table, I was joined by a Red Cross rep who knew my troubles and wanted to ensure I didn't puke on the staff. Accompanied by a coworker, she introduced a blood drainage dream team consisting of a jovial nurse named Rose and her trainee. Then, after Rose snuck the needle in, the oddest thing happened—everyone stayed and watched. It felt like a preview of my wake, which was disconcerting, but wonderfully distracting. Plus, while fear is powerful, so is shame. Fainting with an all-female audience would have created entirely new issues.

I bled like a stubborn maple in sap season, but after 10 minutes, eight of which were spent telling me to relax, a sack of my blood appeared by my feet. I was so proud. I felt like I'd birthed the thing. Staring the bag down, I used the line I'd been saving all week. "Rose, are you a Steven Seagal fan? Because you can take that to the bank—the blood bank."

Down a pint but adrenalized, I slurped rugged sips of juice and mauled a package of Lorna Doones. Stroking my beard, I turned to an adjacent couch, where a young woman lay faint and clammy with a damp towel on her forehead. "That used to be me," I boasted with a cock of my chin. "It gets better."

"This is my third time," she wheezed. Showoff. ×××

MORE THAN A HILL OF BINAS

Tasting globally, sourcing locally...

HAVING MADE their mark on Beacon Hill as owners of both Lala Rokh and Bin 26 Enoteca, siblings Azita Bina-Seibel and Babak Bina are extending their gastronomic reach to Downtown Crossing with Bina Osteria and Bina Alimentari. Located side-by-side at the Ritz-Carlton Towers, yet operating independently, the "osteria" (a restaurant) and "alimentari" (a European-style food shop) share the same commitment to sustainable, locally-sourced foods that's been a focus at the pair's other venues.

Got a craving for milk-fed, Vermont-raised baby buffalo? Brian Konefal, Bina Osteria's executive chef, serves up buffalo bolognese and short ribs. Next door, pick up house-made breads, pastas, gelati and pastries, as well as imported specialty groceries and artisanal wines. Both osteria and alimentari are open daily.

ALSO WORKING THE LOCAL angle is the Local, a new pub in West Newton whose chef, Brian Counihan, and co-owner, Frank Santo, helm the well-regarded Isabella in Dedham. Unlike its upscale, fine-dining predecessor, the Local's prices top out at $20 (hanger steak with warm soba noodles and Thai peanut sauce), as Counihan explains, "to fit the time we live in right now."

INK RE: DRINK: Last summer, rumors were rife that the B-Side Lounge was on the brink of being sold to new owners who would transform Cambridge's cocktail capital into a beer bar. Although the B-Side has, indeed, closed its doors after a 10-year run, the prospective deal apparently fell through, and if there's a Plan B, nobody's talking.... Mixologist Misty Kalkofen, a former B-Sider, has left her position as bar manager at Green Street in Cambridge to join forces with John Gertsen at Drink in South Boston.

Dining { ERIN BYERS MURRAY WITH CHRIS DOUGLASS }

ALL BUTTERED UP

A South End fave wins new fans with dinner.

WELCOME TO THE NEIGHBORHOOD Chris Douglass appreciates the local dining scene—and the moules frites.

TO SAY THE SOUTH END has changed a lot since the 1970s would be a massive understatement. Where burned-out buildings once stood, moms now tote double-wide strollers and sweet shops flourish. Just ask Chris Douglass, the chef/owner of Icarus on Appleton Street. Chris has been monitoring the nabe since he started cooking there 30-plus years ago.

He described what the area used to look and feel like over dinner at the South End Buttery, a coffee shop–turned–neighborhood cafe. "There's nothing like it in Boston anymore. You might compare it to New York's Lower East Side [many] years ago. Just a place you didn't really want to be," he said. Scanning the crowd of modern preppsters (V-neck sweaters, khakis, Patagonia jackets), it was hard to visualize pre-gentrification. For better or worse, the Buttery represents exactly how far the South End has come: a line-out-the-door cafe by day and an affordable bistro-bar by night. Around us, customers dug into plates of locally sourced food. It's a good example, Chris suggested, of how the city's dining scene keeps improving.

Change seems to be in the air for him, too. With Dorchester's homey Ashmont Grill and the recent Tavolo, a small pizza joint, Chris is getting ready to revamp his first restaurant, Icarus. "I think something like a Silvertone or great gastropub would do really well down here," he told me. "Our Icarus customers have moved on. It's time for something new."

With that acknowledgment we dove in; Chris had the pork rillette appetizer ($9), which came with a tart cranberry mostarda and toast points, while I started with the moules frites ($11). The fries were crispy and breaded, perfect for dipping in either the spicy fennel-and-saffron mussel-broth or a dollop of truffle aioli. Our cute server recommended a glass of Ramsay pinot noir ($11) to pair with Chris' meal and a glass of Gavi di Gavi ($10) for me (both stellar suggestions).

Between sneaking peeks at the Patriots game playing on a TV over the bar, Chris and

I chatted about his history in the business. After a few years studying forestry at UMass, he left college to cook professionally. He eventually landed at Icarus, taking it over some six years ago. That was about the time he started scouting locations for Ashmont Grill. Chris settled on a spot in Dorchester near where he's lived with his wife and two kids for more than 15 years. Despite opening what he calls his "type of place" (casual neighborhood joint), he found shifting to the role of owner/restaurateur a little frustrating. "I'm a cook. It's what I've always done. But now I'm in meetings, taking phone calls, running a business. It's really hard to get behind the line anymore," he said.

Pat's Wellfleet clams

Cod with braised artichokes

Roasted pear with blue cheese

Our entrees arrived, getting us back to the subject of food. Chris' order of Pat's Wellfleet clams with apple wedges and a cider broth ($19) didn't have the same rich, buttered creaminess as it would in Brittany, France, he told me—but still slurped them up with pleasure. Pat Woodbury, the clam supplier, is one of his close friends. I tried the cod with braised artichokes ($19), which was perfectly cooked and huge for the moderate price. We also tucked into a side dish of pear roasted under a layer of thick, melted blue cheese, wildflower honey and hazelnuts ($6).

Around us, the crowd started to thin as the Pats struggled to get their footing. Our conversation returned to Boston's evolving dining scene. "When you've been in this business in the same place for 30 years, you see a lot," Chris said, explaining that he has watched the local food community grow more excited and educated, thanks in large part to the restaurants. "It makes me proud to have been part of the generation that made people aware of the food they were eating." ×××

TAKE THE HARD LINE

An inherited phone number provides surprising insight into the economy.

FOR THE PAST FEW MONTHS, creditors have besieged me with calls. Day and night—oh, they love dinnertime and weekends—my voicemail is filled with the threatening demands of debt collectors. Am I a victim of the economic crisis? No. I'm a victim of the landline.

For the past four years, I was gloriously untethered to a home phone. All I had was my cell, and it worked great. But then I moved, and it proved worthless at my new digs. Verizon, why do you hate Quincy people? I'd call you and ask, but my phone doesn't work.

Eventually, my Verizon contract will expire, and I'll join the iPhone cult. But in the meantime, I need a reliable way to order pizzas. That means a landline.

Initially, I resisted going back to a landline, but Comcast dragged me in with its Triple Play deal. Essentially you give Comcast a monopoly over your personal communications—TV, phone and Internet—and they give you a free Nintendo Wii. I've wanted a Wii ever since it came out. Comcast could've made like Rumpelstiltskin, demanding I also sign over my firstborn, and my response would've been, "Will I need a special controller for Mario Kart?"

And I've been enjoying my video games, even if my Mii (your self-styled Nintendo avatar) looks like a demented anime version of Hefty Smurf, minus the blue skin. But I've paid a steep price for my virtual lawn darts and boxing. I learned the hard way that no Wii is ever truly free. Because, even as I sharpen my Wii golf swing, my new phone is ringing. And ringing. And ringing.

Returning to the landline is like going from flying on the Concorde to shuttling around on an Airbus. I'd say that one out of every 20 calls that I get on my home phone is legit. The rest are wrong numbers, debt-collectors and robocalls from the Quincy school system. You see, my landline uses someone else's old phone number, and it's not surprising that they wanted to get rid of it.

I'd say that a fifth of my calls are recorded messages from North Quincy High School principal Earl Metzler, who is chock-full of news. Earl is a bit of a tattletale, I must say. He calls when school is canceled (Election Day, Veteran's Day, Earl Just Feels Like a Day Off Day); he calls when report cards come out; he calls when you skip school. Earl's a total narc, man. You can't hide your report card or have a cigarette down by the train tracks without Principal Metzler ringing your parents and ratting. I know—so lame.

Let your foot do the talking.

One out of every 20 calls that I get on my home phone is legit.

But Earl's calls are pleasantly infrequent compared to those of the debt collectors.

Our voicemail is constantly filled with payment demands, which is embarrassing since our answering machine is the kind that blares the message to everyone in the room. Honestly, I thought that speakerphone machines went out of production in 1998 and only figure as plot devices in sitcoms, but it seems nobody has informed the cordless-home-phone industry of the concept of private voicemail. I suppose I could turn the volume down, but then how would my wacky houseguest, Barney, learn about the Alien Life Form who lives in the garage?

The debt collectors are a wily bunch. I try to screen them with caller ID, but they're masters of deception. The first time I saw "S. Stone" on the ID, I thought it was Sly and the Family Stone calling to tell me that they wanted to record the sequel song I wrote, "Dance to the Music, Too." But S. Stone is a robocall debt-collector. As is "Venus Corp." and the mysterious "Cell phone."

It really doesn't matter what ID they assume, because I'm annoyed regardless. Either my voicemail gets filled with debt-collection messages, or I answer the phone and have to explain that I'm not the person they're looking for. And debt collectors are a skeptical bunch, because they seem to barely believe my explanation, despite the fact that they're calling for a woman. She must be a husky lass. Still, once you convince them they've got the wrong number, they don't call back. Which got me thinking.

Now that they're calling all the time, I realize that the debt-collection industry is the stupidest business this side of whatever it is AIG does. Say I run up 25 grand in overdue debt. What's the consequence? Somebody's gonna call and whine at me? And I can make them stop just by telling them they've got the wrong number? I should've let Lehman Brothers in on this.

So here's my alternative to the government bailout: Everyone just change their phone numbers. That'll buy us some time, until the economy picks up. Time that we can use to become leaner and more competitive, at least at Wii boxing. ✖✖✖

A REAL BACKUP PLAN

Matt Cassel plays like a franchise quarterback.

IT WAS THE DAY before the biggest game of the year, and boy did things feel different in Patriots Nation. The Jets were coming to town, and our guys were pinning their hopes on Matt Cassel and Ben-Jarvus Green-Ellis. Cassel and Green-Ellis? Really?

Yep. Bill Belichick has taken a group of untested no-names and made us believers. I don't remember being this satisfied with any team a few games over .500. The Pats have, once again, won my allegiance.

Considering the injuries that have riddled the team since opening day, this franchise has no right being in the playoff mix. But here we are, it's early December, and I wouldn't be surprised if the Pats won the whole damn thing.

I wouldn't be surprised if the Pats won the whole damn thing.

The reason is Matt Cassel. I can't believe I'm saying this, but the kid—the same one who hadn't started a game since high school—is the real deal. I remember watching Cassel stand at the podium before that Thursday night showdown with the Jets. He showed some major stones. He reminded me of Brady up there with the microphone under his chin.

But looking like Brady off the field isn't nearly as important as looking like him on it, and suddenly, after weeks of learning on the job, Cassel is no longer just talking the talk. He's comfortable with his new role leading one of the greatest franchises in professional sports.

"This position is a lonely position, and it's a tough position especially going into your first game," Cassel said, referring to his start against the Jets two months ago. "Then you get in there and you realize it's football, and you've been working hard for this, you've been practicing for this for a long time. Eventually it starts to all settle down, and you say, 'I'm ready.'"

Brady couldn't have said it any better. And lately, he couldn't have played any better either. I'm in shock, but I'm not alone. Patriots Hall of Famer Steve Grogan is as surprised as anyone, but like so many others, he's fallen in love with Cassel.

"I would think Matt Cassel is going to cash in with some team around the NFL," Grogan said. "Its just been so much fun to watch him mature as a quarterback. He has all the tools—footwork, arm strength and the mobility to get out of the pocket. And when he does, he really puts pressure on the defense. The kid's put himself in a great position to take over a starting job somewhere else."

When Brady first went down, many questioned Belichick's decision to stick with Cassel. Why didn't he have a better backup plan? Why didn't he have a real backup quarterback?

Cassel was dreadful in the preseason. At the time, I didn't think he beat out his competition: Matt Guttierrez and Kevin O'Connell.

But while watching that Jets game, it all started to make sense. He threw 50 passes and completed 31 of them. He threw three touchdowns. What happened on the final drive of regulation couldn't have been more perfectly scripted by Brady himself. Cassel led the Patriots back from what appeared to be a sure loss to tie the game as regulation expired.

The Patriots eventually lost in overtime, but they gained a franchise quarterback.

And once again, we were taught that all-important lesson: In Belichick We Trust. We didn't think Cassel was ready, but sometimes you have to ask: Doesn't Coach know better? Is he really going to put a guy out there who can't do the job?

With every great Matt Cassel performance, we're reminded that Belichick does know better. Simply put, the man is the best. ✖✖✖

ON NOMAR, RAJON, ODEN AND THE LUCAMOTIVE

3 Best Athletes Under 23

Milan Lucic... How young is the Lucamotive? When Super Mario Bros. 3 came out, he was only one. (We'll give you a second to contemplate how depressingly old you are). Lucic—who turned 20 in June—represents all there is to love about the state of the Bruins, and once his skills catch up with his toughness, the future will look even brighter.

Jerod Mayo... Yeah, we gushed over the 22-year-old linebacker last issue, and then he went and racked up 20 tackles against the Jets. Clearly, our praise only makes Mayo better (fighting off bad mayo pun). He's a shoo-in for defensive rookie of the year; he's the future face of the organization; and if you mix him with ketchup, you get Russian dressing (damn!).

Rajon Rondo... He'll still drive you crazy at times, but what 22-year-old doesn't? John Stockton didn't average double figures until he was 25. Steve Nash didn't average 10 assists until he was 30. Hell, when Larry Bird was 22, he was still at Indiana State. So next time you're ready to lose your patience with 'Jon, keep in mind that he was born the same year the ball went through Buckner's legs.

5 NEW BLASTS FROM THE PAST

Leon Powe's scream is... the anti Walker wiggle

Unless he's being strangled by Zach Randolph, you'll never see Powe get too animated on the court. That is, except for the screams: Those rare and special moments after a particularly big play when Powe lets loose and yells so loudly that you'd swear Reggie Evans just grabbed his balls. It's not about celebrating himself or showing anyone up. It's merely one man—in his own world—killing himself for a victory. It's the anti Walker wiggle.

Ray Allen's jumper is... Nomar's swing

We admire the beauty of Allen's jumper so often in these pages, we're no longer allowed to watch it from closer than 100 yards. It's an obsession reminiscent of 1997, back when every Nomar at-bat felt like Christmas. The man had a swing so sweet, it made Reese Witherspoon look like a bitch. Even though he never realized his dreams in Boston, the swing lives on forever.

2008 Randy Moss is... 2007 Paul Pierce

Pierce has always been a star, but until last year he lacked the maturity and motivation to become a truly great leader. See where we're going here? We keep waiting for Moss to lose his cool—you know, curse out Josh McDaniels, leave the field early, wipe his ass on a goal post—but that moment might never come. Actually, screw "might." It's not going to happen. Captain Randy's renaissance is for real.

Matt Light on Channing Crowder is... the new Robert Parish on Bill Laimbeer

The circumstances were (obviously) different, but there were some serious parallels between how Light and Chief went about beating down their respective foes. There's also some serious comedy if you imagine Laimbeer with shoulder-length dreads.

Jabar Gaffney is... the ghost of Reche Caldwell

Gaffney's had a few shining moments in New England, but right now his hands are a borderline liability. We're not sure how to remedy the situation but ask Coach Belichick to hang tight until we decide whether to nickname Jabar after Featherstone from Necessary Roughness or the toilet-paper kid from Little Giants.

4 DATES TO WATCH

12/5 The Trailblazers come to the Garden, and we all get our first look at Greg Oden. Although he has hardly dominated since his return from injury, Oden's shown a propensity for rebounding, blocking shots and conning movie theater employees into a senior-citizen discount.

12/8 The MLB winter meetings commence in Las Vegas, and we eagerly await the answers to many of our Hot Stove questions: Is Texeira coming to Boston? Will K-Rod get $75 million? And who's a bigger animal at the strip clubs: Brian Cashman or JP Riccardi?

12/12 The New Orleans Hornets and the one-and-only Big Game James cruise into Boston. Right now, all the Rays fans are thinking: "Hey! I didn't know James Shields played for the Hornets, too!" Just kidding. They probably don't know who James Shields is.

12/14 The Patriots head out to Oakland for a matchup with the Raiders. Owner Al Davis recently said that a win over New England would be the "greatest 115th birthday present a team could ever give me."

ONE MOMENT OF SILENCE

for Helen Heinsohn—who passed away on Nov. 24 after a long bout with cancer. The Redhead From Needham was the greatest love of perhaps the most lovable figure in Celtics history. Our thoughts and prayers are with Tommy and his family.

2 THINGS YOU NEED TO STOP DOING

Wondering if Matt Cassel will be back next season... Oh, fine. You can keep wondering. But spare us the headache of hearing you say it out loud. They won't trade Brady. They won't sign Cassel. They won't even franchise him. You really think the sultan of the salary cap is going to roll with $14M worth of quarterbacks on his roster? If you do, we hear the Lions are looking for a new GM.

Patronizing Scal... First of all, it's already tired. Second, there's so much else to root for. And most important, the guy publicly asked you to stop! Unless the C's make a big roster move in February, Scal's contributions are more integral to winning another title than you might think. So save the screaming for after he drains a three, instead of in the middle of his release.

STELLA ARTOIS

Perfection HAS ITS PLACE

A perfectly poured Stella Artois is the Gold Standard of Belgian beer.

Step One THE PURIFICATION

The bartender selects the signature glass for the beer being poured. The glass is scrubbed in a cool-water bath, preferably with a mild detergent. It's then rinsed with cold water to chill the glass.

Step Two THE SACRIFICE

The tap is opened in one swift motion to let the first burst of foam flow away. It must never enter the glass, thus ensuring every drop of beer is fresh.

Step Three THE LIQUID ALCHEMY

The glass is held at a 45-degree angle to create the perfect balance of liquid to foam.

Step Four THE HEAD

The head is created by straightening and lowering the glass. The foam is visually appealing and releases the beer's aroma.

Step Five THE REMOVAL

The bartender closes the tap in one quick action and moves the glass away from the faucet to ensure no drops spoil the perfect head.

Step Six THE BEHEADING

While the beer is flowing over the edge of the glass, the bartender cuts the head gently with a head cutter at a 45-degree angle. This eliminates the larger bubbles that burst easily and accelerate the dissipation of the head.

Step Seven THE JUDGMENT

Step Eight THE CLEANSING

The bartender then rinses the bottom and sides of the glass. This keeps the glass clean and cool and makes it comfortable to hold.

Step Nine THE BESTOWAL

Soroff On JAY MOHR

The comic sounds off on critics, sexism and stand-up.

ACTOR, COMEDIAN, PRODUCER AND WRITER Jay Mohr currently stars in the new sitcom Gary Unmarried, which airs Wednesdays on CBS. A New Jersey native, Mohr, 38, cut his teeth as a stand-up comic in Boston. He hit the big time as a cast member on Saturday Night Live, where he was nominated for an Emmy and became known for spot-on impressions of celebrities like Christopher Walken. His fame grew with his role as sports agent Bob Sugar, opposite Tom Cruise, in Jerry Maguire, one of 20 feature films in which he's appeared. On TV, his credits include The Ghost Whisperer, Fox's NFL This Morning and Mohr Sports, an original weekly ESPN comedy/sports talk hour. He lives in California.

Jonathan Soroff: Is Gary Unmarried the best show ever on TV?
Jay Mohr: Obviously. I mean, Jesus, if you watch Seinfeld, Frasier, Mary Tyler Moore or Newhart, you can see in the first two minutes of Gary Unmarried that they just eat its dust.

Are you better looking in real life or on camera?
I think in real life. But in real life, people are taken aback by my shoulders and, unfortunately, my belly.

The reviews for Gary Unmarried were...
Tepid, but they singled me out as good.

Do you care what critics think?
I've always been a fan of negative reviews. I always like to see how they spin it to include wordplay, like "Gary Unfunny." They can't just say, "I didn't like it." They have to say it in some clever way. But I've been in many critical successes that failed, so if people think it's an average or below-average show, I'm more than happy to stay on it for the next six years.

You blogged recently about a colonoscopy.
Yeah, although it's not really a blog; it's a much longer story. It would have been a real blog if it was an, "Oh, I'm taking a long dump; I can blog about something real quick." But you have to see it in my stand-up act.

There's one line: "Thirty feet of rubber hose and diarrhea juice..."
I've had diarrhea for six months and counting, my friend. Keep your fingers crossed.

Was Saturday Night Live the hardest you ever had to work?
It was the lack of work that made it so hard. I'm used to showing up, being pointed where to stand, and having all the lines and jokes. There, I had to wait my turn. So in terms of stress level and having panic attacks, it was most certainly the hardest. I've done movies that were pretty grueling, too.

One month you're on the cover of Vanity Fair, the next no one answers your calls. How do you deal with that?
I'll let you know when I'm on the cover of Vanity Fair. I think it's Rachel Weisz this month.

OK, let's be a little less literal. You went from "You're the next big thing" to "What's he up to these days?"
Look, if Gary Unmarried goes five years, no one has to return my phone calls for the next 15.

Your forte seems to be the sexist stereotypical guy role.
It's a daily struggle to keep Gary unsexist. A big thing about this show is Gary has to have a moment each week when he brushes the hair out of Alice's eyes and says, "You're right." Otherwise, he's just a bull in a china shop.

How close is that to you in real life?
Well, I'm not sexist, but I certainly wouldn't hire any women. It's only a matter of time before you're in human resources for saying, "Hi, hot stuff." Who needs that? I'd rather hire a bunch of gay men who look a little bit like women and call me hot stuff and pat me on the ass. I'd be appreciative.

Does Christopher Walken know where you live?
No, but he might have a crystal ball at home in Connecticut, listening to us right now. I think one of his eyes is a crystal ball.

Are you afraid of him?
No. I want to follow him into the center of the sun. And I want his hair tips.

How do you keep your stand-up chops?
Come up with a 10-minute story every three months. Like I just went to Medieval Times for my son's sixth birthday, so I have that story. And I had the colonoscopy, so that's 20 minutes right there. So as long as I continue having cameras inserted into my holes and my son keeps having birthdays in strange places, I'm good.

So you don't need to stay in shape by performing in clubs?
No. I know in my head if it's funny. I'm in a very good spot. Comics reach a point, if they're very, very lucky, where you're the reason everyone has assembled. Everyone's there because they think the way you think is funny.

Is stand-up comedy like boxing?
It's more like math. The numbers add up. There's just a right way and a wrong way. It's much easier than drama. People say, "Drama's easy, comedy's hard." That's said by unfunny people. There's many, many ways to do drama—crying, screaming, very quiet, creepy. But there's only one way to do comedy, and that's the funny way.

How do you deal with hecklers?
I don't get a lot, but usually just tell them to shut the f up or leave.

Dream role?
I want to play Chet Baker more than anything. I love the story, the drama, the tragedy. I can sing just like him. I love the androgynous voice.

Last question: Is it a burden being funny?
No. It's a burden being so handsome. But you know what's really a burden? When I go to Target wearing my red sweat suit. ×××

BACK IN BLACK

Bruin Patrice Bergeron returns to the ice. By Rich Levine Photograph by Kerry Brett

Accidents happen. But sometimes one slip, one fall reshapes an identity. Buried away, the memory can break through in a painful instant. The best use it, finding new focus and strength, gaining appreciation.

Patrice Bergeron's moment came last October, when an illegal hit from the Philadelphia Flyers Randy Jones sent the future of the Bruins hurtling headfirst into the boards. As the then–22-year-old lay on the ice—motionless, aside from some noticeably heavy breathing—fans couldn't help but fear the worst. Twelve years before, they'd seen another promising young skater, BU's Travis Roy, take a similar fall and never walk again.

Bergeron knew it was bad, too. For a moment, he even thought he was dead. But after leaving the ice on a stretcher, he never once considered not being able to play again. "I wasn't thinking about much [in the days and weeks after the hit]," Bergeron says recently. "It was more about getting through each day and trying to feel better. It was very tough. Especially those first two months. I could hardly walk around the house. It was hard sometimes to stay positive, but I had no doubt in my mind that I'd be back."

But after doctors diagnosed him with a Grade 3 concussion, the frustrating question was, "When?"

"There's no cookbook to rehabbing concussions," Bruins trainer Don DelNegro explains. "It was very hard for Patrice that we weren't able to tell him when he'd be back. It's not a goal-oriented rehab. It's all based on symptoms. But as athletes, they have trouble comprehending that. They're so used to being told, 'Six weeks, and you'll be back.'"

It took a full year for Bergeron to return to the competitive ice, and now it seems silly to even ask him about the hit. He's filed it away; he'd just as soon forget it. Then again, it's also become part of his identity. It's something people will talk about for as long as he plays hockey, something that will linger in his psyche every time he chases a puck into the corner.

Thankfully, when Bergeron is forced to recall the events that could have ended his career, he does so in a way that leaves no doubt that, in the long run, he'll be better off for having overcome the odds. "Sometimes you play 82 games and have no time to be thankful for who you are and what you've accomplished. That will never be the case for me now."

The easiest way for Bergeron to put talk about his injury and recovery to rest is to return to the pre-injury form that had the Bruins faithful all but convinced he'd one day bring the Stanley Cup back to Boston. That journey reached another checkpoint on Oct. 23, when he scored his first goal of the season. It was his first goal in more than a year—and the first time since the injury that he really felt like a true hockey player, instead of a recovering one.

"Obviously it was a relief," he says. "I know that people were talking about everything that I was doing, and it was nice to get that goal because now there are no more firsts. No more first game, no more first home game, no more first goal. So now I can just look forward, and I'm very happy about the way I'm playing."

And it'd be impossible not to be happy with the way the Bruins are playing. At press time, the team is in first place in the Northeast Division, has given up the second fewest goals in the NHL and has brought a hard-nosed, head-busting brand of hockey back to Boston. Their opponents are taking notice: They're no longer just the lowly Bruins.

"Teams are respecting us a little more now," Bergeron says. "We have to be aware of that and make sure we're ready to match that effort."

It's been almost 10 years since the Bruins won a playoff series—nearly 20 since they've played for the Stanley Cup. Still, there's a core group of diehards who haven't lost faith, and, with every win, a bandwagon that's cruising towards Causeway Street with increasing momentum.

"The fans have always been so supportive, ever since I've been here, and I know we didn't always give them the wins that they wanted, but I think they recognize the intensity and the attitude that we bring to the ice," Bergeron says. "We've seen it with the other sports teams in this city. It's a lot of fun to win in Boston, and we want to be right there. You don't wake up and say, 'You know what? We're going to win the Stanley Cup!' You have to work at it and that's where we're at."

For right now, maybe just being there—working, fighting and playing with his teammates—is enough for Bergeron. He's back doing what he loves, back "playing his passion." And even though the injury is part of his identity, he'll never let it define him. ***

WINTER SPORTS

By Matt Heid Illustrations by Daniel Chen/121 Art

IT'S 8 AM IN EARLY NOVEMBER on the outskirts of Anchorage, Alaska. At these northern latitudes, the sun still hasn't risen. A moose stands on an adjacent hilltop, silhouetted against a pinkening dawn sky. A layer of skiable snow coats the ground. And I'm about to get shot out of a dog-pulling cannon down the hard-packed trail in front of me.

"Let's go!" shouts Becky Voris, a competitive racer with the Anchorage Skijor Club. She takes off ahead of me, towed by her dog Attla, a blue-eyed, 78-pound package of yowling energy. Roz, Attla's sister, tears after her. And I'm attached. Suddenly it's as if the horizontal world has tipped, and I'm flying across the landscape. I have just enough time to revel in the euphoric speed before wiping out in a spectacularly embarrassing fashion.

Welcome to skijoring, one of three cold-weather pursuits helping outdoors enthusiasts endure the chilliest, darkest season. Going about half as fast as Voris' 20 miles per hour, I manage to forget all about the temperature. No small feat at 15 degrees Fahrenheit. Winter's already here in the Last Frontier, but soon these activities—skijoring, snowkiting and winter peak-bagging—will get under way in New England. And you don't have to be a professional to partake.

WHILE I CATCH MY BREATH, club president Kathy Faryniarz explains how to get started in skijoring. "Any dog will do it. It just takes time and patience," Faryniarz says, noting that canines should be at least 40–50 pounds. Newcomers also need to invest in some simple gear: a harness for the dog ("Never expect a dog to pull from the collar," she cautions), a tug line with a stretch bungee to mitigate the shock of starts and stops, a quick-release clip for emergencies, and either a padded waist harness (less comfortable) or a full sit harness with leg loops (better). A complete set runs around $100.

Skijoring requires a degree of skiing ability as well; at the least, participants are usually intermediate cross-country or skate skiers. Voris emphasizes that it's not a free ride, courtesy of your dog. "It's a team sport. You should be trying as hard as they are," she says. "And the more you hoot and holler, the more fun you'll both have."

As we wrap up, Faryniarz sips from a plastic Vermont coffee mug, a memento from her pre-Alaska life in the Green Mountain State. "I started skiing back East," she reminisces, explaining her current passion. "I love dogs but didn't want a kennel in my backyard. Skijoring was a good solution."

For Steve Crone, owner of the Telemark Inn in Bethel, Maine, a kennel in his backyard was appealing. Nestled in the mountains of western Maine near Sunday River, his property includes the lodge, an adjoining cross-country ski area, and a full-tilt mushing enterprise, New England Dog Sledding. Crone's operation currently boasts more than 70 active and trained dogs—"I'm the owner, feeder and dog-shit shoveler," he jokes. "It's becoming more popular. Globally, I think it's the fastest-growing dog sport."

Crone offers lessons throughout winter. One of the biggest training challenges, he explains, is the need to rewire family pets. "Skijoring is about reattaching your dog to its true genetic code: Get out in front and run! It can be confusing for house dogs that are used to 'sit' and 'stay.'"

To combat this tendency, he attaches first-timers to one of his canine crew. This helps teach the dog by example and illustrates techniques for future trainings at home. For Crone, who used to skijor competitively, the sport's appeal is its visceral connection. "Most people want to spend time with their dogs. Skijoring is basically human–dog fusion in the woods." He laughs and then adds, "Plus, you've got to do something rather than freeze your butt off."

HIS NAME IS JOHN DESALVO, but his buddies call him Johnny D. His chosen pursuit is kiteboarding and its cold-weather offshoot: snowkiting. The winter premise is simple. Participants attach a specialized kite to a seat harness, collect the wind's power, and soar across the frozen ground on skis or snowboards.

In New England, enthusiasts cruise lakes, ponds and fields. They routinely hit speeds of 30 miles per hour or more. When conditions are right, they take flight, floating above the landscape for long stretches. The sport is an extension of kiteboarding, in which people surf the wind-chopped sea.

A resident of Westborough, Mass., 30-year-old DeSalvo estimates that he squeezes in 60-90 water and 10-20 snowkiting sessions yearly. "It's addictive. It's absolutely addictive," he enthuses. "We're just human beings harnessing free energy. There's a certain romance around that."

When it comes to equipment, it's relatively straightforward. The same skis and snowboards used at downhill resorts work just as well for snowkiting. The remaining gear is a seat harness and a training kite; they can be obtained for roughly $300-$400, less than the cost of an average pair of ski boots. (Addiction rapidly gets more expensive, however. High-end performance kites run more than $1,000.)

A bigger challenge for snowkiters is the amount of space it requires, which is why the vast expanse and consistent winds of Vermont's Lake Champlain make it one of New England's premier destinations. It's where former competitive sailboat racer Rachael Miller operates Stormboarding, one of the only outfits in the Northeast to offer snowkiting lessons.

Miller, 37, who launched the company in 2004, cautions aspiring snowkiters to learn the basics first before striking out on their own. "It's like scuba diving," she says. "It would be dangerous to just slap a tank on your back and jump in the water." On the upside, snowkiting has a short learning curve. "The vast majority of people are already riding by the second or third hour of their first lesson."

Snowkiting is a relatively new phenomenon in New England. As recently as five years ago, few people had even heard of the sport, much less practiced it. To increase public awareness, Miller organizes Kitestorm, an annual event that has attracted hundreds of participants since its inception in 2004. Held at Lake Champlain, it features free mini-clinics for newcomers and vendors who sell the necessary gear.

Kitestorm highlights one of the key aspects of this burgeoning pastime. "It's all about community," DeSalvo explains. "This is not a loner sport. Kiting is a group activity." To foster that spirit, he cofounded Masskiting.com, a Web site for New England kiters. "This is going to be one of the fastest-growing sports in America," he predicts. "It's just an amazing thing to be a part of."

WINTER PEAK BAGGING

COMPARED TO SKIJORING AND SNOWKITING, winter peak-bagging isn't the fastest-moving sport. Powering up snow- and ice-covered mountain flanks on foot doesn't exactly happen at light speed. But it's a race against time for those trying to tag the summits of all 48 New Hampshire peaks above 4,000 feet in the coldest season. The rules are strict and set by the 4,000-Footer Club; only summits reached during calendar winter, from solstice to equinox, count.

Reji James of Arlington, Mass., has been steadily ticking off the list over the past few years. So far James, 39, has tagged the top of 37, a feat all the more remarkable because he only started winter hiking in 2003—and had never even seen snow before moving to New England from India in 1995. These days, he ventures out at least three weekends a month.

The risks are substantial. Subzero cold, vicious winds and unstable weather all pose serious threats to safety. It's also part of the appeal. "The main thing is that it's fairly challenging," James expounds. "When you're hiking above treeline, it can get really windy, nasty. The biggest factor is your brain. You have to use the right judgment."

Larry Takiff, 48, echoes the sentiment. "The demands are much higher than in three-season hiking. You are always challenged, physically, emotionally and mentally." For Takiff, the appeal is less about the summits. "What I enjoy, more particularly, is to challenge myself and have a good time with my friends." Nevertheless, he has tagged most of New Hampshire's 4,000-footers, reaching some of them dozens of times. These days, he spends roughly three-quarters of the season's weekends hiking.

Both James and Takiff received part of their training from the Winter Hiking and Camping Instruction Program offered by the Boston Chapter of the Appalachian Mountain Club. Held over a five-week period, the course provides novices with the skills and knowledge needed to embark on cold-weather treks.

Topics include the appropriate gear for staying warm and comfortable. At a minimum, aspiring winter hikers should invest in a multiple-layer clothing-system that's adjustable depending on conditions, a quality pair of insulated boots, and a toasty set of gloves or mittens. For above treeline travel, a face mask and goggles are also essential—peak-baggers must be able to protect every inch of exposed skin from the icy wind.

Bob Moore, the coordinator for this year's training, muses on the sport's appeal. "There's less people. It's more scenic. You get views that you don't get at other times of the year. Once you overcome the fact that you're not going to freeze—provided you have the right preparedness and gear—it's amazing." Plus, as James sums up, "There's no point in stopping your outdoor activities just because it's winter." ✖✖✖

FROST BITTEN

OUR WRITER SURVIVES WINTER SAILING.

PHOTOGRAPHS BY HEATHER MCGRATH

I'm falling into the ocean. It's inevitable. I'm sliding headfirst across the deck of a J-24 sailboat, which heeled over hard as we tacked to change direction. Just as the water rushes up to meet my face, I catch my toes on the raised lip of the hatch, halting my slide long enough to snatch a cable attached to the mast and cling to the boat for a moment longer. Someone grabs my jacket and pulls me away from the edge as the boat rights itself. I've only been on this vessel a few minutes, yet sailing already is giving me a newfound perspective on why everyone got so excited about the invention of the steamship.

Why am I sailing in November, anyway? That's an excellent question if you, like me, believe boats belong in a warm-weather tableau, along with hammocks and lime-garnished beers. But there's a band of hearty sailors who keep on hoisting their lines and trimming their sheets all winter long. They're called frostbiters—because, I suppose, the word "masochist" is simply too general.

They meet at the Boston Sailing Center at Lewis Wharf every Saturday morning to assemble into crews and race around a course in the harbor. They do this regardless of mild meteorological impediments such as snowstorms. I try to bring an unbiased attitude toward new experiences and groups of people, but I'll admit that I stepped onto my designated boat harboring the uneasy suspicion that I was about to spend several hours humoring the mildly insane.

Rama is the guy who grabs my jacket and helps prevent me from taking an unscheduled swim. Also on my boat are Ben, Jon, Kathryn and Bob, the skipper. I'm notable among the crewmembers in that I'm the only one who is generally useless and occasionally an active liability. As we position ourselves for the first race of the day, clustering among 12 other boats heading for the buoy that marks the starting line, Jon makes a joke about lightening the load by throwing me overboard. At least, I think he's joking.

In terms of an environmentally friendly, yet completely antagonistic, human endeavor, the start of a sailboat race is like 15 Prius drivers vying for the same parking spot. There's lots of yelling and acrimony, but it's all accompanied by the peaceful sound of the wind-whipped waves. There's a hierarchy for who has pole position, as it were, but I can't really figure out how it works. I'm too busy trying not to get hit in the head by the boom to ponder how many near-collisions occur before the race even starts.

We make it past the first buoy, and we're in good shape—one of the lead boats in the pack. We follow the Eastie side of the harbor, heading out toward the ocean, until Jon announces that we've reached the "lay line," which is the line that will take us on the best path to the next buoy on the other side of the harbor. We tack to the right, and I dutifully belly-crawl under the boom to the opposite side of the deck, where my weight will help counterbalance the lean of the hull. I guess I'm useful for something; now that I mention it, I make excellent ballast.

It turns out that sailing not only has a lot of nomenclature, it's pretty heavy on amateur weather forecasting as well. As we make our way across the harbor, Rama reads the wind patterns on the water surface and predicts the course that will bring us to the best puff. "Puff on in 10 seconds!" he yells so that everyone can prepare for the boat to lean over as it catches the breeze. A feathered look is what you want; thar be wind thar. Flat water is no good at all; that's a hole. And you don't want to sail into a hole, matey.

While we're on the lay line, I have time to contemplate my strategy for the rest of the day. Now that I'm getting used to the crazy angles, I can evaluate how to best make it back and forth across the deck without ruining myself. The J-24, you'll find, leaves much to be desired in terms of ergonomics. If you don't crawl, you hit your head. If you do crawl, you inevitably whack your arms, legs and torso on some piece of equipment. "I have a friend whose high-school guidance counselor asked her if she had trouble at home, because she was always covered in bruises," Kathryn says. "She said, 'No, I'm a sailor.'"

Complicating matters is the lack of both handles and a railing, except for a pair of flimsy lines around the circumference of the deck. As the boat heels over, I find that the best way to get to the high side is to stretch to the opposite edge and then essentially do a pull-up. A couple times I flail for a handhold and miss, sliding back far enough that my legs drop into the water up to my knees. If this weren't the warmest November day in recent history—more than 60 degrees—I'd be severely bumming about my wet footsies.

The sky opens, and the deck gets even slicker as rain pounds our boat in heavy droplets.

We round the buoy by the World Trade Center and find ourselves with a comfortable lead. That's not what I expected. "If we win," Ben says, "do you think someone will protest that we had a weight advantage?" I realize that he's referring to me and my catlike shifts to the high side of the boat. And by "catlike," I mean a cat who's about to be thrust into a bathtub—desperate, wild-eyed and spastic. "If anyone can successfully argue that my presence constitutes an advantage," I say, "I'll scrub their bilge." I'm confident that I will not be scrubbing any bilges today.

It's a smooth ride back to the start, and we win our first race, occasioning fist-bumps all around. I'm a big proponent of quitting while you're ahead, but unfortunately that's not an option. We cluster around and head back toward the starting line for the second race, our bow pointing straight toward a menacing black thundercloud.

After more frantic course-changes and a few curt "douchebags!" directed at our competition, we're sailing directly into typically apocalyptic late-fall weather. The sky opens up, and the deck gets even slicker as rain pounds our boat in sheets of heavy droplets. As I try futilely to pull my hood up against the storm, I take a stab at sailor humor. "I think it's clearing up!" I shout as the wind pummels us with God's own fire hose. "I don't think the heavy stuff's coming down for a while!" Rama agrees. Excellent Caddyshack reference. Have I mentioned that, until it began raining, Rama's foul-weather gear consisted of a Hawaiian shirt? He has now donned a jacket—grudgingly, for sure.

Despite the weather, we cruise to another easy win, and I actually believe that I'm helpful, pulling down the green nylon sail when needed and leaning over the edge a bit more enthusiastically when my side of the boat comes out of the water. I'm even picking up more of the lingo. "Let's give them some dirty air," I say when it appears we have the opportunity to get in the way of another boat's wind. "Yeah, they're in our shit!" Rama replies. We also win the third race—at one point running with the wind behind us and blowing hard enough that the water looks like it's trailing a wakeboard boat—and I'm beginning to think I must be the key to victory. That is, until the fourth and final race. It seems that everyone's tired. We pick bad lines and miss the wind. We come too close to another boat, somehow violating the right-of-way rules, and are forced to sail in a circle, twice, as a penalty. Kathryn gets walloped in the forehead with the boom, which might've been my fault, since my position on the deck places me pretty much in her way. But at least we all stay out of the harbor, which is more than can be said for a guy on another crew, who topples into the drink and is rescued by the chase boat. Still, I'm not sure he's much wetter than I am at this point.

If you want to get cold and wet before boozing, there are quicker ways to do it. So there must be a deeper appeal.

We straggle into the finish near the back of the pack. Whatever—with three consecutive wins, I'm still calling us the sailing dynasty of Boston Harbor. Beers are produced, and camaraderie ensues. Once the boats are tied up, everyone heads into the sailing center, eats chili and downs a few more drinks before filing off to the Boston Sail Loft. I realize that—perhaps unsurprisingly—I'm enjoying this aspect of frostbiting a lot more than the part out on the water where you might actually get frostbitten. It's like skiing that way. The scene at the lodge is that much sweeter when you've been freezing your ass off all day. Still, if you want to get cold and wet before boozing, there are quicker ways to do it (just go down to the L Street beach in Southie on New Year's Day). So there must be a deeper appeal to this odd sport.

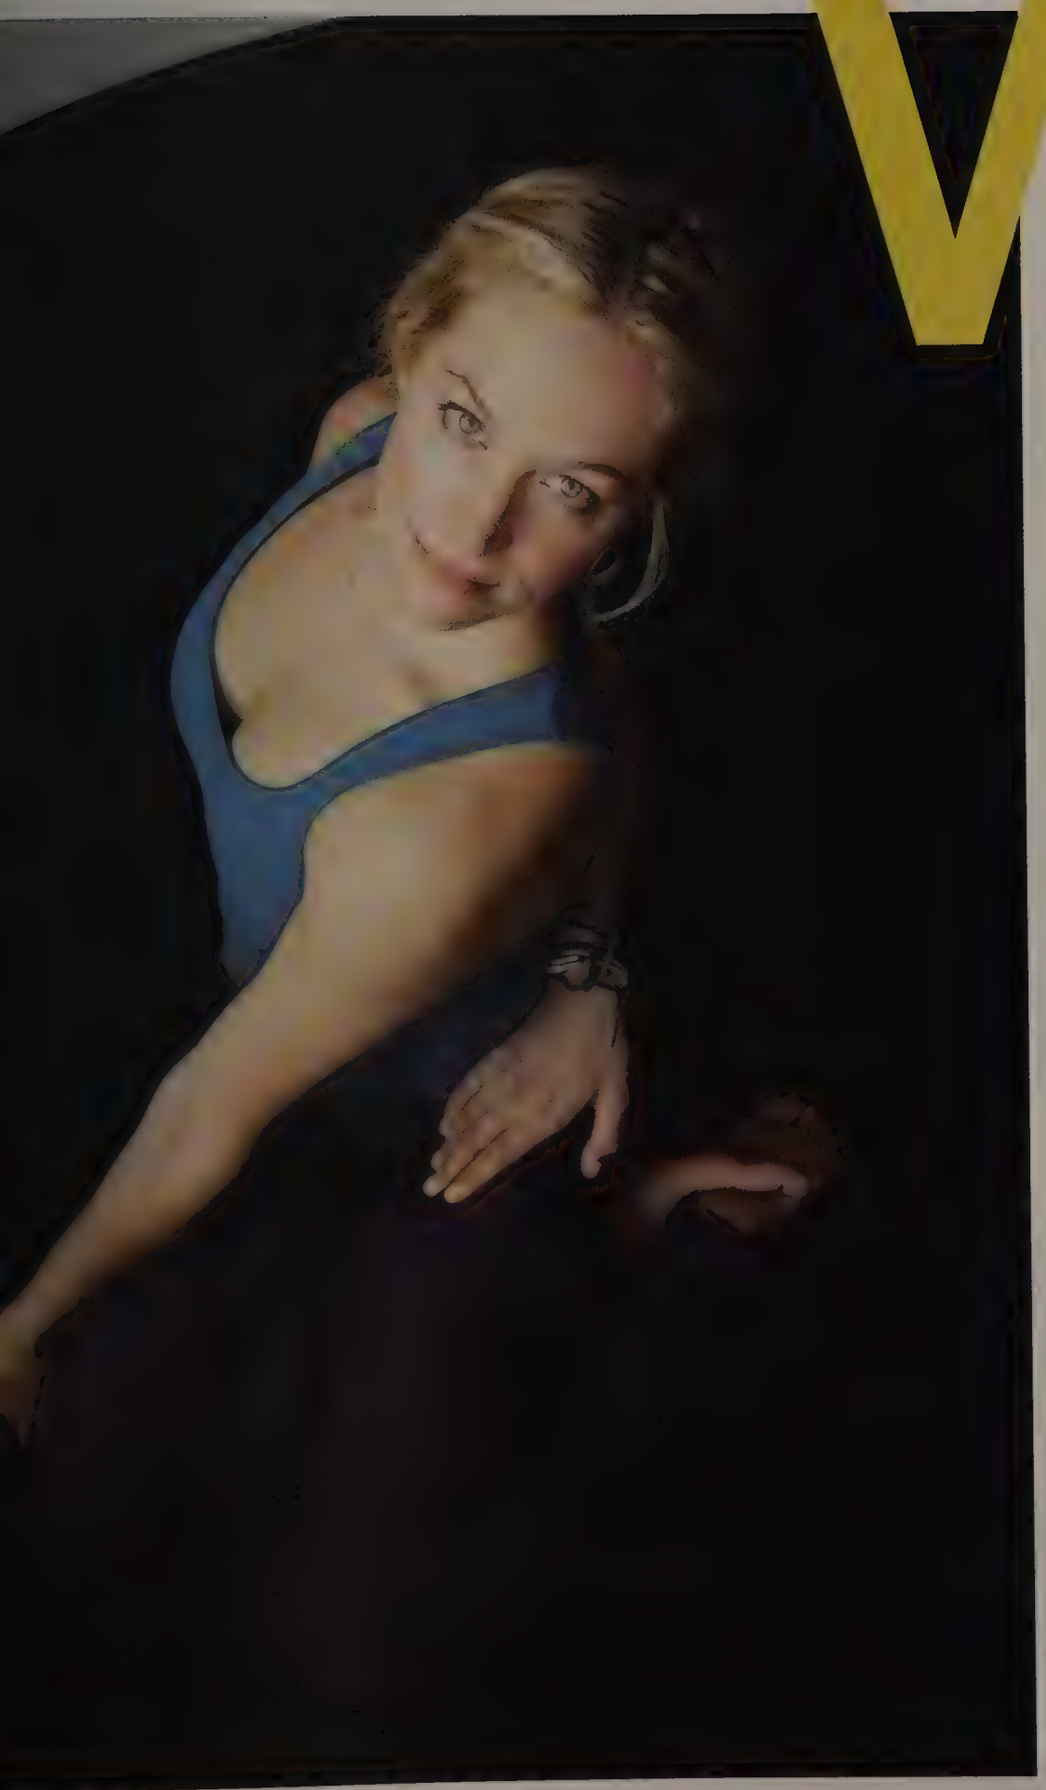
I ask a woman named Tina how she fell into this crowd, how she decided that what she wanted to do each winter Saturday was go sailing. "Well, it just got to September and October, and I didn't want the sailing season to end," she replies. "So I tried this." I'd expected an answer more rooted in machismo, something about the attraction of pursuing an activity too extreme for the feeble general public. "Essentially, you should live in Florida," I say, "so you can go sailing year-round. But since you don't, you'd rather be cold than not doing it at all." She more or less confirms my assessment.

I guess I can understand that—the cold isn't an attraction in and of itself, but a necessary condition of pursuing a favorite pastime. And this does seem like a fun group of people. But if I try frostbiting again, I might modify the schedule a bit to suit my own priorities and tolerance for discomfort. In other words, my fellow crewmembers, your ballast will be waiting for you at the Sail Loft. ×××

Golden Girl

Yoga instructor Taryn Toomey's style shines through.

By Amanda Knorr
Photographs by Blake Fitch/Wonderful Machine



When I met Taryn Toomey at Lululemon's Prudential Center opening Nov. 1, she tore through the dressing room like the store was going out of business. Turns out, 30-year-old Toomey is a yoga instructor for the Sports Club/LA, Exhale and North End Yoga. Clearly, she had an appreciation for cute workout clothes—but it was her boots, burgundy wrap sweater and fairy-tale braids that caught my eye. She worked in fashion; I was sure of it. "Ralph Lauren for six-and-a-half years!" she confessed. A couple weeks later, we sat down in her Beacon Hill apartment to discuss how she switched jobs without compromising her sense of style.

Improper Bostonian: How would you describe your style?
Taryn Toomey: Bohemian chic. I like stylish but relaxed clothes. Fitted on the bottom, loose on top or vice versa.

Who are your favorite designers?
A few designers I really like are Catherine Malandrino, 3.1 Phillip Lim and YaYa Aflalo. But overall, I just buy what I like and that varies from designer to designer, season to season. What I really love is a great vintage find, a one-of-a-kind piece.

Favorite places to shop in Boston?
I really like Holiday, Anthropologie, H&M, Neiman Marcus and Intermix. Sometimes I find good pieces in Second Time Around, but I need to have a lot of patience when I go in there.

What was it like to work for Ralph Lauren?
I loved working at Ralph Lauren and how defined their fashion and culture was. I think I was there at the right time in my life. If it were now, I wouldn't be as motivated to always be decked out just to go to work. Employees really live the part at RL.

Do you have a million Ralph Lauren items in your closet?
I do miss the sample sales. They were incredible! But you wind up with a lot of stuff you just never wear. So I have clothes I'd wear to the office and some more formal things, but a lot of it never comes off the hanger.

Why did you decide to leave the fashion world?
I had been practicing yoga for years and always had a little teaching bug in me. I enjoyed fashion and knew that I could make a long career of it, but yoga just always held a place in my heart. I wanted to share some of the things I had learned from my own mat. [My husband] fully supported me, and I've never looked back.

Has your sense of style changed at all since you left that world?
I have always had the same sense of style. I am just able to express it more now that I don't work for a specific fashion brand. I used to have to prep it up a bit for work, which is not really my style. I've never been a preppy gal.

What do you wear when you're practicing yoga?
For yoga, I always wear long pants (not a fan of capris) with a tank or halter. I like the monochromatic look with some accents, like a colorful scarf or long cardigan that I'll take off right before I practice.

Tell me more about the accents.
During the week, I am always in yoga clothes. So I usually try and dress it up a bit with scarves, earrings, long sweaters and boots in the winter, or long tunic tops and sandals in the summer. A friend calls it my "convertible look." So while I am wearing yoga clothes, I can also walk out on the street after class and not feel too exposed.

What do you wear outside work?
Right now, I like long, fitted tops with leggings and tall, high-heeled boots, or fitted jeans with a fun top and a wrap. I like to dress up with lots of different jewelry. I'll mix special things my husband gave me with vintage pieces. ***

Domestic Dispute

PUCK OFF

BOSTONIANS LOVE DEEP-rooted rivalries. Watch a favorite face-off on Dec. 5, when BC's Eagles take on BU's Terriers for men's hockey dominance. National polls predict a roster season for the Terriers, but both teams will have to give it the ol' college try as they vie for pre-Beanpot glory. Rivalry between the schools is a celebrated tradition. Even the coaches played against each other in their college days. Will BC's Jerry York and BU's Jack Parker stop acting like buddies and brawl in the penalty box this year? You'll have to wait for the puck to drop to find out. — KYLE WRIGHT

Capsules by Sean Burns

Australia ★ ½ Less of an assault than his headache-inducing Moulin Rouge, director Baz Luhrmann's latest postmodern pastiche attempts to revive the sprawling, Technicolor travelogues of the early CinemaScope era. Nicole Kidman stars as an uppity Englishwoman who finds her fortune as an unlikely cattle baron in the rugged outback, thanks to Hugh Jackman's self-consciously macho, anachronistically progressive cowboy. Like most Luhrmann films, Australia is an index of iconic shots and sequences from other, better movies. There's something almost charming about the deliberately dated soundstage shooting and retro special effects, but the filmmaker's adoration of MGM artifice doesn't blend with a subplot concerning his homeland's attempted genocide of the Aborigines. It also feels like the longest movie ever made, with major characters fed to crocodiles during expository montages so that the story can keep rebooting every time you think they'll all live happily ever after. Crikey. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Body of Lies ★★ Much like Alec Baldwin, Russell Crowe is way more fun when he's fat. Excess poundage seems to bring out an intense actor's more playful instincts, and Crowe is a porcine, honey-drawled delight as the smirking embodiment of American arrogance in Ridley Scott's otherwise dreary espionage thriller. David Ignatius' knotty novel was adapted by The Departed screenwriter William Monahan. Once again, we've got Leonardo DiCaprio undercover and in over his head. Scott has never been much interested in storytelling, and Body of Lies is so busy with showy aerial photography and confusingly edited action sequences that the plot doesn't really kick in until about halfway through. DiCaprio tries to track down a terrorist while juggling the suspicions of a Jordanian intelligence authority (an excellent Mark Strong) and the demands of a tacked-on romantic subplot involving an Iranian nurse. Crowe steals the show from the sidelines, stuffing his face and all but begging for a movie of his own. (At Boston Common, Harvard Square and in the suburbs.)

Burn After Reading ★★★ ½ Don't be fooled by the vibrant colors of Emmanuel Lubezki's cinematography or the giant cartoon performances of the cast, because Joel and Ethan Coen's follow-up to their masterful No Country for Old Men is every bit as bleak as its Oscar-lauded predecessor. It's just a heck of a lot funnier. For reasons too convoluted to explain here, Brad Pitt's exuberant himbo gym instructor tries blackmailing John Malkovich's boozy CIA burnout, with more than a few unforeseen complications arriving via George Clooney's sleazy lothario and Tilda Swinton as the world's meanest pediatrician. Shot, cut and scored with the ominous overtones of a paranoid thriller yet performed as broad farce for maximum dissonance, the Coens send all this silliness spiraling into bloodshed with clockwork precision. Like most of the movies from these gifted, dyspeptic brothers, Burn is secretly about the tragic smallness of people and the fatality of self-absorption. Every character is doomed by assuming they're more important to the plot than they actually are. (At Boston Common and in the suburbs.)

Changeling ★★ Clint Eastwood's latest directorial effort is a nasty little number. It's grueling and unpleasant in the manner of all late-period Eastwood, but it's missing the crucial moral uncertainty that marks his masterpieces. Angelina Jolie stars in this true story of a flapper-era single mom whose son is kidnapped and murdered. Five months later, the famously corrupt LAPD returns a boy who bears a slight resemblance, then banishes her to a mental hospital when she dares declare that this shorter little weirdo isn't actually her child. The outrageous injustice of it all doesn't escape Eastwood for a second. He's righteously angry, shooting Jolie in angelic silent-movie tableaux and casting the L.A. cops as sniveling, wormy toads. Jeffrey Donovan, the cut-rate Guy Pearce look-alike playing Jolie's grand inquisitor, lacks only a mustache to twirl. Every slightly interesting angle in this perplexing, James Ellroy–friendly tale of police corruption has been flattened out and oversimplified to the point of preposterousness. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

A Christmas Tale ★★★★ Writer/director Arnaud Desplechin's dizzying take on the tired yuletide saga about a dysfunctional family is so joyously overstuffed, watching it is like speed-reading a massive Russian novel. Catherine Deneuve stars as the aloof, ailing matriarch of this screwed-up clan. She needs a bone marrow transplant, but which of her damaged, embittered offspring will provide a genetic match? With energy and good humor, Desplechin heroically pursues her family's secrets, grudges and hidden resentments. No scene plays out predictably, as the revelations and recriminations ricochet off one another to a jaunty soundtrack. In its own peculiar fashion, this twisted tale proves strangely inspiring, as it dodges pat resolutions with a rueful smile. (At Kendall Square.)

MIGHTY MILK

Milk
Starring Sean Penn, Josh Brolin, James Franco, Emile Hirsch and Diego Luna. Written by Dustin Lance Black. Directed by Gus Van Sant. At Kendall Square, Coolidge Corner and in the suburbs.

Phil Bray

PLAYING THE TITLE ROLE in Milk, director Gus Van Sant's rousing, shockingly accessible biography of slain civil rights leader Harvey Milk, Sean Penn does something we haven't seen him do in years. He smiles.

Penn is undoubtedly one of our finest actors, but also one of the most miserable. While I appreciate recent performances in films like Mystic River, 21 Grams and The Assassination of Richard Nixon, it's hard not to wish the dude would lighten up a bit. Even when cashing a paycheck for a dopey thriller like The Interpreter, Penn played the hero as a depressed alcoholic mourning his dead wife. It's hard to criticize a talent this large, but he's grown awfully predictable, with a cloud of gloom bearing down on his mumbled Brando-isms.

This is why Penn's first scenes in his latest film crackle with a sense of rediscovery. We watch buttoned-down businessman Harvey Milk trying to seduce James Franco's young stud on a New York City subway platform, and Penn's joy of performance is instantly palpable. Milk shouldn't have a chance with this kid; he's too old, too square, and with his shrill voice and lanky movements, altogether too awkward for such a hunk. But there's wit and playfulness in Penn's eyes. Milk's a smoother operator than appearances suggest, and it isn't long before these two have moved to San Francisco together.

San Fran in the '70s must have been one hell of a party, and what's perhaps most surprising about Milk is the buoyancy that Van Sant brings to the proceedings. Oscar season biopics usually feel like homework, but the movie charts Milk's rise to prominence as a freewheeling, high-spirited romp. The filmmaker's exuberance matches that of his lead actor, who, it seems, hasn't had this much fun since Fast Times at Ridgemont High.

Organizing the electorate from his Castro Street camera shop, Milk serves as ringleader and de facto den mother to a rowdy gang of persecuted lost boys, most of whom fled to San Francisco to escape persecution in their hometowns. Milk is a natural-born politician, and he sees strength in numbers. Shrewdly realizing that commerce can trump bigotry, he rallies his troops to support gay-friendly businesses and forges an unlikely alliance with the Teamsters Union during their boycott of Coors beer. Never losing his sense of humor, he makes his speeches standing on a box marked "soap," prankishly announcing, "My name is Harvey Milk, and I'm here to recruit you."

This film has been in various stages of production for decades, so it's an odd accident of timing that the second hour chronicles Milk's tireless campaign against a discriminatory California referendum proposition. After becoming a city supervisor and the first openly gay man elected to public office, he's stuck maneuvering backroom deals with fellow politicos while orchestrating protests from behind the scenes. Milk's crew must compete with the homophobic bile of religious zealot and orange juice pitchwoman Anita Bryant. Just as George Clooney discovered when casting a Joe McCarthy for Good Night, and Good Luck, Van Sant understands that some personalities are too cartoonish to be believed in a movie, so it's more effective to incorporate archival footage and let them hang themselves.

Anyone familiar with the history already knows that this story spirals into tragedy, but Van Sant manages the tricky tonal shift without compromising the film's upbeat, hopeful spirit. Dan White, Milk's increasingly unhinged political rival, is played with uncommon sensitivity by Josh Brolin. The W. star portrays White more as a sad and frightened man than as an outright monster.

Eight years ago, Van Sant turned his back on Hollywood and devoted himself to abstract, lyrical poems like Gerry, Last Days and Paranoid Park. These are lovely, challenging films for specific audiences, and the grumbling amongst hard-core cineastes is that Milk is disappointingly mainstream for an artist of Van Sant's caliber. This complaint ignores the keen visual intelligence that the director and his longtime cinematographer Harris Savides bring to Dustin Lance Black's occasionally prosaic screenplay. Note the pointed contrast of Milk looming large in the center of the frame in his boisterous Castro District neighborhood versus sequences in City Hall that place Penn and Brolin in cramped corners of the screen, dwarfed by the enormous government architecture surrounding them. This is intelligent filmmaking—externalizing the character's relative stature by expressing it through his surroundings.

Furthermore, it's hard to see how Milk's life story would benefit from the same cryptic treatment Van Sant gave to Kurt Cobain in Last Days. Milk is nothing if not an impassioned plea for tolerance and acceptance, and as such, logic dictates that the movie should be crowd-pleasing and broadly entertaining. Like the inclusive ideals it staunchly advocates, the film is open to everybody. ✖✖✖

Four Christmases ★★ Vince Vaughn makes a magnificent thin-skinned jerk, rolling his eyes and nattering over some perceived slight. The only catch is that he's no good at sincerity, which is a big problem now that he's starring in his second sappy holiday flick in as many years. (The less said about Fred Claus, the better.) Four Christmases stars Vaughn and Reese Witherspoon as callow yuppies attempting to avoid an uncomfortable quartet of family dinners. These are two selfish, uncaring people, but the movie lacks the nerve to follow through on their monstrousness, instead pleading for our sympathy and presenting their families as cartoonish, bullying grotesques. There's one nicely played sequence involving Sissy Spacek as Vaughn's horny, hippie mom and a game of Taboo, but the rest of these meals are sub-Fockers slapstick. Director Seth Gordon helmed last year's phenomenal documentary The King of Kong, but his feature debut fails to sustain a consistent tone. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

I've Loved You So Long ★★ Despite a beautifully understated performance by Kristin Scott Thomas, writer/director Philippe Claudel's tearjerker is suffocated by its own coyness. Thomas stars as Juliette, recently paroled after 15 years in prison for a mysterious murder. Claudel tap-dances around this and many other revelations for most of the running time, dropping hints and insinuations and generally driving us crazy. Juliette's staying with her estranged sister (Elsa Zylberstein), yet the two siblings say little of import to one another, their tumultuous family history and the truth about Juliette emerging only in infuriatingly tiny dribs and drabs. Thomas is a marvelous, subtle performer. The film's lone pleasure comes from watching her reacquaint herself with the outside world as she slowly opens up through judicious use of body language and a dawning light behind her eyes. But the eventual "shocking" revelations prove pat and anti-climactic. I've Loved You So Long plays smoke and mirrors with the story because, were it told in a straightforward manner, there wouldn't be enough for a movie. (In the suburbs.)

Nick and Norah's Infinite Playlist ★★★ ½ If you can get past the most twee movie title in years, director Peter Sollett's follow-up to his endearing indie-hit Raising Victor Vargas turns out to be unexpectedly adorable. It's sincere and awkward where Juno was fabricated and crass. Michael Cera stars as a heartbroken teen bass player, a straight man in an all-gay punk band, the name of which cannot be printed here. Through a variety of convoluted circumstances, he finds himself stuck in a Yugo after a gig with Kat Dennings' insecure dreamgirl. They cruise the streets of New York City after curfew, meandering through misadventures and fumbling toward puppy love. Based on a young adult novel by Rachel Cohn and David Levithan, Nick and Norah exudes an uncommon sensitivity, patiently allowing these kids to mumble and make mistakes, so unlike their poised peers on film and television. As in Victor Vargas, there's a real delicacy to Sollett's direction, with an almost enchanted sense of late-night magic infusing his grungy East Village settings. (In the suburbs.)

Quantum of Solace ★★★ If you look at Casino Royale as the James Bond franchise's Batman Begins, this nasty piece of business counts as the series' The Dark Knight, as it sends a dour and vengeful 007 into a chaotic world gone wrong. Daniel Craig once again compellingly plays the legendary secret agent as a perpetual motion machine, brusque and cruel in the manner of Ian Fleming's original novels. The film takes a while to get rolling, as it's frontloaded with too many inconsequential chase sequences that are often poorly staged by director Marc Forster. But Quantum improves considerably once folks are allowed to settle down and start speaking to one another. Paul Haggis' screenplay snarkily reconfigures the past movies' shadowy cabal Spectre as a new millennium group of cutthroat capitalists bleeding the world's natural resources dry. It's lean and mean to a fault; a bit more breathing room for the supporting cast might have helped matters. Still, the sheer viciousness of the film and bleakness of its worldview are bracing. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Rachel Getting Married ★★★★ Jonathan Demme's extraordinary new film transforms a weekend wedding party into a tapestry of jumbled humanity. Taking a cue from the late Robert Altman, Demme packs his frames with overlapping chatter and cockeyed conviviality. Cutting through the clatter is Anne Hathaway's revelatory performance as Kym, the bad-seed sister fresh out of rehab who hijacks the festivities with one narcissistic faux pas after another. The screenplay, by first-timer Jenny Lumet (daughter of legendary director Sidney), has a few tricks up its sleeve, including an old family tragedy from which Mom (Debra Winger) and Dad (Bill Irwin) may never fully recover. What's most miraculous about Rachel is how expertly Demme navigates Lumet's hairpin tonal shifts. The film swings from hilarious to crushing and back again, sometimes within the space of a single scene. There's so much joy in this movie—so much music and happiness spilling outside the frame—but also stark, unflinching pain. (At Coolidge Corner, Kendall Square and Waltham Embassy.)

Slumdog Millionaire ★★★½ This blast of filmmaking exuberance from Trainspotting director Danny Boyle offers the year's catchiest gimmick. Jamal (Dev Patel) is an uneducated orphan from the slums who finds himself an unlikely contestant on India's version of Who Wants to Be a Millionaire. As luck would have it, every question serendipitously unlocks another flashback chapter in his wild, picaresque biography. With such a structure, The Full Monty writer Simon Beaufoy's screenplay can't help but err on the schematic side. But it's a thrilling experience nonetheless, thanks to Boyle's verve and commitment to sensory overload. Jamal's saga is Dickens by way of Bollywood with a touch of fairy tale magic. As the valiant young hero rockets from one dangerous scrape to another, even the ghastliest images of poverty are emboldened and energized with vibrant Technicolor hues. Will Jamal rescue his childhood sweetheart from the Fagin-like local crime lord? Can he win the 20-million-rupee jackpot? As the answers unfold, cinematographer Antony Dod Mantle cranks up the colors while Boyle blasts the bouncy music cues, all to thrilling effect. (At Coolidge Corner and Kendall Square.)

Synecdoche, New York ★★ In his startlingly original screenplays for Being John Malkovich, Adaptation and Eternal Sunshine of the Spotless Mind, Charlie Kaufman merged depressive angst with absurdist whimsy to create his own genre: heartsick slapstick. His directorial debut, a grammar-nerd goof on my mom's hometown of Schenectady, is similarly ambitious but lacks any levity or momentum. The film is obsessed with the ways art cannibalizes life, the deterioration of the human body and finally the grim inevitability of death. Philip Seymour Hoffman stars as a sickly theater director attempting to make sense of his life by staging it as an ever-evolving theater experience, until he becomes so consumed with recasting and rewriting that he loses all trace of himself. It's a nifty metaphor, one perhaps more suited for a novel, but as a feature, Synecdoche is an unbearable grind that's relentlessly one-note, dingy and oppressive as you wait for everybody to die of old age. The movie is thrilling to discuss afterward, but torture to actually sit through. (At Kendall Square and Waltham Embassy.)

Twilight ★ Stephenie Meyer's tween novels reach their insidious cinematic potential in the hands of Catherine Hardwicke, who trivialized adolescent drug use with her insipid Thirteen before shrinking the Virgin Mary's life story into a Dude, Where's My Manger epic in her justly forgotten Nativity Story. Twilight teaches young girls that a hunky, handsome vampire (Robert Pattinson) will always love you for your clumsy, banal self, no matter how dull you are. The film is a deeply unsettling glimpse into modern American psychosis, equating desire with death and boasting enlightened concepts like, "We can't go all the way, because then you'll turn into a monster." So amateurishly assembled that the villains don't even arrive until the 90-minute mark, this is Hardwicke's most incompetent movie yet, about as lame as you'd expect from a 53-year-old lady lecturing "these kids, today." (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Vicky Cristina Barcelona ★★ ½ Though problematic and slightly sloppy, this pleasant trifle is Woody Allen's most consistent effort since 1999's loopy La Strada remake, Sweet and Lowdown. Rebecca Hall and Scarlett Johansson star as Vicky and Cristina, American postgrads spending a summer in Spain. Enter Javier Bardem's free-spirited Latin lover and stock stereotype, who probably would be risible if played by any other actor. Bardem delivers his loosest, goofiest performance yet, embracing the role's mildewed clichés with contagious delight. Romantic entanglements and disentanglements ensue, complicated by stomach ulcers, girl-girl crushes and ill-advised rushes to the altar. The most fun comes from Bardem's ex-wife, a lusty psycho played in a movie-stealing turn by Penélope Cruz. Allen's direction is perkier and more alert than his recent work; he even moves the camera once in a while, soaking up the Barcelona scenery and gazing adoringly on his good-looking cast. Modest in both aim and accomplishment, it's hardly a return to form, but it'll do. (At Coolidge Corner and in the suburbs.)

W. ★★★ Hardly the comic hit-piece Dems were hoping for, Oliver Stone's curiously compassionate take on Bush turns out to be one of the legendary muckracker's most restrained pictures. Hewing largely to the historical record, Stanley Weiser's succinct screenplay runs on double tracks, alternating snatches of Dubya's wasted youth and born-again reformation with scenes from our long walk to war in Iraq. In the title role, Josh Brolin exhibits an uncanny mastery of the sputtering grammatical train wrecks and apish arm gestures that have made their mark these past eight years. It's bizarrely entertaining to watch Stone's blunt force dramatizations of those sinister cabinet meetings, with special scorn heaped on Toby Jones' Karl Rove and Richard Dreyfuss' subtly menacing Dick Cheney. As in his audacious 1995 biopic, Nixon, Stone can't help but muster sympathy for the devil. W. is the tragedy of a deeply shallow, arrogant man, who works out his daddy issues on an international stage. (At Boston Common and in the suburbs.)

A Natural Talent Known for his philanthropy as much as his cool-handed acting, Paul Newman's spirit lives as the Brattle Theatre pays tribute to the late movie star Dec. 3–7. Long before his name became synonymous with salad dressing, Newman played a bank robber in director George Roy Hill's Butch Cassidy & the Sundance Kid and a high-stakes pool shark in Robert Rosse's The Hustler. Pair with organic popcorn and enjoy.

Zack and Miri Make a Porno ★★★ Kevin Smith's first decent film in a decade conspicuously borrows current comedy hero Judd Apatow's stock company of actors. This makes a strange sort of sense, as the man-children and scatological sweetness of Apatow's The 40-Year-Old Virgin and Superbad owe enormous debts to Smith's do-it-yourself debut, Clerks. It's also just refreshing to see trained professionals handle Smith's unwieldy, overwritten dialogue as opposed to his high-school buddies or Ben Affleck. The hilarious Seth Rogen and a luminous Elizabeth Banks star as broke best friends attempting to make a stag movie for quick cash and discovering unexpected feelings once it comes time to perform. Sunny and optimistic even when wallowing in potty-mouthed filth (real-life porn stars Traci Lords and Katie Morgan play pivotal roles), the film is an unexpectedly heartfelt salute to the creative process. Zack and Miri fosters fond feelings for this makeshift family of slackers, who grow and prosper by focusing their energy into a productive endeavor, even if it's one that involves anal sex. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

WINTER THAW

Bon Iver
plays the Wilbur Theatre Dec. 14.

Sarah Cass

THE ALBUM FOR EMMA, Forever Ago has a near-mythical reputation that stems not only from its haunting indie-folk sound, but also from the backstory of its creation in the wilds of northwestern Wisconsin.

Justin Vernon recorded the CD alone in his father's hunting cabin, where the singer/guitarist spent three months in the winter of 2006–2007. He stoked wood stoves for heat, ate deer meat that his family stored from that year's hunt and hatched one of 2008's most critically acclaimed albums. continued on page 62

So it's fitting that Vernon called his new project Bon Iver, French for "good winter."

"I don't spend too much time worrying about the whole mythology," says Vernon, 27. "I just don't want people to think that I'm some awesome dude living in this story-like place. Everyone's life isn't like that. Even as majestic as you'd imagine Thoreau's cabin to be, it probably wasn't."

Indeed, Vernon doesn't sound prone to romanticizing as he prepares for his latest tour (he and three bandmates play the Wilbur Theatre Dec. 14) as well as a follow-up disc. He plans to record alone again next year, but not at the cabin. He and his brother bought a house three miles from their parents' home outside Eau Claire, Wisconsin. So it's close enough to civilization that his father won't have to deliver beer, milk and eggs during the next recording jag.

"I'm not going to hunker down so heavily, 'cause that's harder to do, but I'm going to be here mostly by myself," Vernon says from his new bungalow/studio in Fall Creek, a few miles from Eau Claire. "I'm not going to think too much before I [start recording]. Ideas are just ideas, man, and they seem to be more like distractions from what you're actually feeling."

That's a lesson learned from his creative hibernation in the woods. He'd broken up with both his girlfriend and his band in Raleigh, N.C., and was returning home to Wisconsin mentally discouraged, physically sick with mono and without money. He needed time and space to rebound.

"Ideas are just ideas... they seem to be more like distractions from what you're actually feeling."

"The only thing I could do was move into dad's place," Vernon says. "I was a little defeated. I didn't have the greatest amount of confidence. But I also knew that I had an opportunity to do something on my own, which I hadn't done in a long time. So it was fun. I was ready to do it."

Not that he was quick to unload music gear (including a Mac with a Pro Tools recording system) from his car. "I knew I would get it out at some point, but I was being lazy and very self-involved, sorta like 'Oh, I'm just going to lie down and make a fire and drink 10 beers or whatever.' It didn't matter what I did, and it was kinda nice that way."

Once Vernon dug into his music, however, the momentum grew. He painted patient melodies on his hollow-body guitar, occasionally adding a pulse on snare or bass drum and other effects.

An E-bow buzzes against his strings like a cicada in "Flume," while he deceptively multitracks his voice throughout, contrasting his ghostly falsetto with low accents and choral effects. The hazy coda to "The Wolves (Act I and II)" evokes a train rumbling in the distance, though it's actually Vernon "freaking out" on a drum kit in Raleigh. "I was having a really angry day," he says.

Vernon says he realized his cabin exorcism grew from "ancient pain" over his first relationship. "I just never got over it," he says. "I didn't realize how serious it was until I made this record."

His lyrical ruminations are often revelatory along those lines, especially on the whispery closer "Re: Stacks," where he resolves, "This is not the sound of a new man or crispy realization. It's the sound of the unlocking and the lift away. Your love will be safe with me."

Yet Vernon claims he was even less intentional about his lyrics than his instrumentation. "The music really wrote the lyrics," he says. "I would sing parts to the melodies first, just gibberish, then I would listen to the gibberish for weeks. And when you're by yourself like that, man, you start to hear things—or you start to allow yourself to hear things."

Luckily, the public gets to tune in as well. ✖✖✖

Forever Young

Rockin' in the Free World Read the biographies of today's biggest bands and you'll likely find the same name on their list of influences: Mr. Neil Percival Young. Rock's greatest chameleon (sorry, David Bowie) is frequently mentioned as an inspiration by rising artists like Fleet Foxes and established groups like Radiohead. Throughout his 40-year career, Young mastered musical genres ranging from folk to grunge, gaining not only respect and adulation from critics, but also legions of fans. He comes back to the Boston area on Dec. 13 to play a one-night concert at the DCU Center. Alt-rockers and self-professed Young disciples Wilco open the show.

Authors for Hire

Mingle Bells

The easiest solution to a long holiday gift list is to outsource the work. On Dec. 8, mix and mingle with notable literary figures, like Clara Silverstein, at the Hometown Authors Reception at the Hotel Commonwealth. After a couple cocktails, ask The Improper's Andrew Rimas to sign Beef for your carnivorous cousin. Then get Silverstein to autograph a recipe in The Boston Chef's Table for your foodie father. It may seem like cheating, but it's for a good cause. The event benefits ReadBoston, a nonprofit group that supports children's literacy.

IMPROPER Sightings!

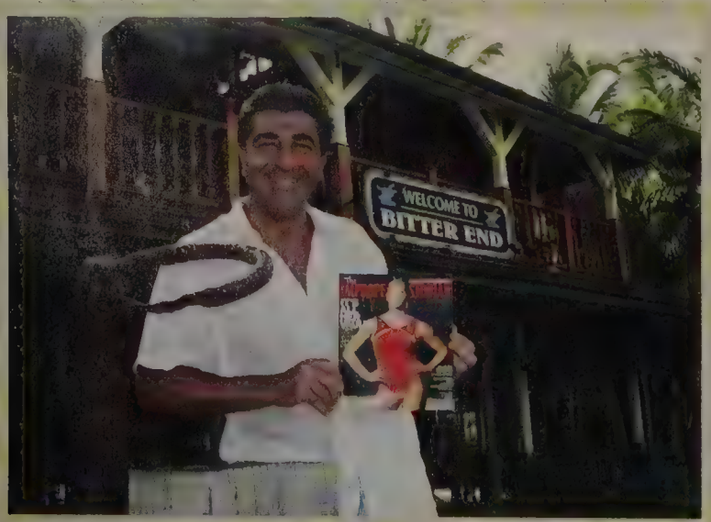
ATTENTION BOUNTY HUNTERS! BONUS POINTS TO ANYONE WHO CAN CAPTURE AN IMPROPER READER WEARING PROTECTION (JUST IN CASE) AT IMMACULATE CONCEPTION DAY, HELD DEC. 8 IN LUQUE, SPAIN.

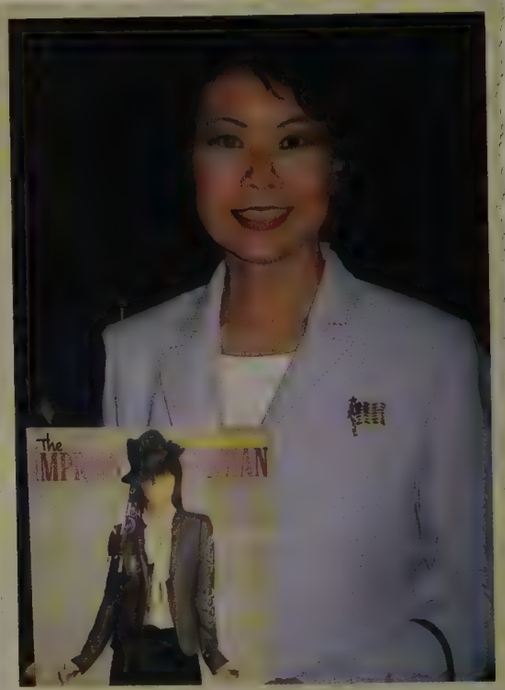
Unlike the rest of your friends, we want to see the photos from your next trip. Where did you take us? Send us a picture of you or a buddy or, better yet, someone famous reading THE IMPROPER BOSTONIAN and tell us where you were. The wilder your destination and the more creative your photo, the better your chances of making the cut in the esteemed IMPROPER Sightings.

Nicole and Matthew Nealon visited Punalu'u Black Sand Beach in Hawaii. They planned to have their photo taken while sunbathing, but instead they're just Nealon.

While in Tunisia, Carol Cunio and Darin Demagistris rode atop Shakira—who, despite being a camel, sings with the voice of a dying goat.



Richard Milliam hit the Bitter End Yacht Club in the British Virgin Islands, where bitter beer face is a good thing.



U.S. Secretary of Labor Elaine Chao—here with our Fall Fashion issue—reminds us that smiles never go out of style. They can even lead to gainful employment.

Economic Crisis? What Economic Crisis?

With a $1.3 million painting and a $1.5 million ruby-and-diamond necklace up for sale, you could be forgiven for forgetting the world financial meltdown at the opening night gala preview party for the Ellis Memorial Antiques Show at the Park Plaza Castle.

There to ooh and aah over the exquisite junk, which raised money for the Ellis Memorial and Eldredge House, were the usual lineup of Brahmins, blue-bloods and big shots, including peerless interior designer Manuel de Santaren squiring the ethereal Mary Woolfson, the bedazzling Natalie Gardiner, force of nature Dola Stemberg, Debbie "Aren't All Those Carats Heavy?" Lewis, rosy-cheeked siren Donna Storer, do-gooder Mary Kay Holder, the Duke and Duchess of Cambridge, Ann and Graham Gund, quintessential Yankee ML Coolidge and white-hot literary agent Esmond Harmsworth (whose father was the English press baron Lord Rothermere) and his other half, sailing champ Jim Richardson.

Alas, the reality of the recent downturn set in when one crass individual (me) tried to encourage a friend to buy a 1920s star sapphire ring from Tiffany.

"It's only $67,000," I said. "Buy it, wear it, and when you kick the bucket, you can leave it to me."

"Great idea," she said. "And you'll get it a lot faster, because I won't be able to afford groceries."

When Worlds Collide...

Beacon Hillbillies Miguel and Suki de Braganca opened their home for their son Miguel and his merry band of bohemians, hosting an art exhibit, concert and fundraiser to benefit an arts education and AIDS awareness program in South Africa. Think hippie-chic invades Louisburg Square.

On the walls were works by young talents like Olivia Ives-Flores, Zacharie Lanoue and Andrew Wragg. Admiring the pieces were neighbors like Bill and Elizabeth Leatherman, the dowager empress Doris Yaffe, the swanlike Francesca Volpe and her mother, Martha, and the delightful George and Lisa Ireland.

Later in the evening, Miguel's band, the New Talking People, performed.

Most of the paintings sold, and both ends of the spectrum enjoyed themselves enormously. After all, how often do women in twin sets and pearls get to flirt with guys who look like the second coming of Jim Morrison?

Cecily Colburn and jeweler Aster Pye at the Ellis Memorial Antiques Show

John Meunier, David Brown and Jim Flanagan at Artcetera

Maggie Messman, Susan Poduska and Mary Jean Keany at Bowl-a-Rama

Some Guys Have All the Luck...

Imagine Christie's with cocktails, or Sotheby's chockablock with hot gay guys, and you'll begin to get a picture of Artcetera, the AIDS Action Committee's biannual art auction at the Cyclorama.

On hand for the thoroughly delightful evening were the event cochairs, anchor hottie David Brown of WCVB-TV's Channel 5 and design guru Dennis Duffy, philanthropic fabulon Philip Brooks, the dapper Jon Foster, smokingly hot couples Wendell K. Chestnut and Zane Bell and John Meunier and Jim Flanagan, collectors extraordinaires Ron and Ronni Casty, and one guest who looked at a painting and said, "It's going for a lot because you get to sleep with the artist."

A friend responded: "I slept with him, and he didn't charge me a penny."

Saks Must Sell Bowling Shoes...

It might not be the best thing about Bowl-a-Rama, the fundraiser for Kids Can Cook, but it's certainly one of the most amusing: Watching the city's swishiest socialites compete in a game that wreaks havoc on manicures and is more commonly associated with beer-swilling guys named Earl—while wearing rented shoes, no less.

Held at King's, the highly entertaining evening also included Bingo With Bingo (starring Bingo Sears of the Chanel boutique), a diamond-necklace raffle where the tickets were cupcakes, and a chance to rub elbows with the likes of Back Bay yummy mummy Maura Connolly and her handsome husband, John Egan, incorrigible scamp Billy Evers, brunette bombshell Mary Jean Keany and the debonair Paul, golden couple Beth and Chris Madison, design avatar Denise Korn and the improbably tall Ari Nachmanoff, and one-woman Mardi Gras Maggie Gold-Seelig.

Amid the sounds of strikes, one guest was heard commenting: "With this crowd, I'm surprised no one has a Birkin bowling-ball bag." ✖✖✖

Don't Worry, Be Happy

Amidst 2008's economic turmoil, moments of inspiration still exist. Cover guy Dustin Pedroia has provided more than a few for Red Sox fans. Pedroia won a Silver Slugger, a Golden Glove and the AL MVP in recent months. And he just signed a five-year, $40.5 million deal with the team.

The arts also provide a welcome pick-me-up, and this season is synonymous with The Nutcracker. In a leap of faith, Jonathan Soroff joined the Boston Ballet's production this year. His humorous account—involving Xanax, stilts and, eventually, knee braces—appears in this issue.

Then there's CJ Husk, aka the Oyster Dude, another beloved Boston character. Food has long been an escape in tough times. Husk keeps it light, bringing bivalves and a playful perspective to the city's best restaurants. We spent three days with Island Creek's delivery man.

Whatever your pleasure, I'm wishing you joy and happiness in 2009.

THE MOTIVATOR

THOUGHTS OFTEN turn existential on New Year's. When else do we take stock of the past and pledge to begin anew? This Jan. 1, life coach Tom Keen recommends some serious self-scrutiny. "People who are searching for meaning," he says, "those are probably my favorite clients."

Meeting customers through Sports Club/LA and his own firm Lifeactually.org, 30-year-old Keen coaches everyone from frustrated homemakers to dissatisfied executives. He's not a psychologist. Rather, he motivates the unhappy to follow their bliss. "It's my job to help them remember who they are," Keen says. "I'm talking kids in the sandbox. Bring them back to when life was very pure and simple and worthwhile and fun."

His guidance often leads people to dust off their gym memberships or embark on long-postponed trips around the world. Other times, he tells clients they're full of it. "When I hear something that doesn't add up, or something that doesn't energize them, I have to say, 'This doesn't seem to be fulfilling to you.'"

The rush of resolutions that accompanies the season can prove fruitful, Keen says. But he's pessimistic about folks keeping them. They're made out of habit, he explains. And habit breaks them. "If you are truly loving, honoring, respecting yourself, you don't wait until New Year's," he advises. "You don't wait until Monday or Friday night. You do it now." JOHN DYER

Breaking the Mold

Coda's Penicillin has both a namesake and a forebear. The former is Alexander Fleming's discovery of mold's antibacterial properties—not exactly a lip-smacking context. "Just like the namesake, it's great for gonorrhea," says bartender Jeremy Lucca-Flaherty with the hard sell.

The latter has a much tastier tale. Originating from Manhattan's famous Milk & Honey bar, the Penicillin began as a mix of peated and blended Scotch, lemon juice and honey-ginger syrup. "It reminds me of a Highlander," says Lucca-Flaherty, referencing another lemony Scotch cocktail. "There definitely can be only one, so we kind of lopped off the head."

The difference is in the execution. Coda uses Dewar's and gives the Penicillin ($9) the Dark and Stormy treatment, replacing lemon with lime and topping it with ginger beer. "The intensity of the drink is not something you usually have in Northeastern drinks," he observes. "But people's palates are changing. They don't want just sugar. They can handle the fierce ginger and lime."

Sipping this potent winter cocktail, the ginger warms your tongue and the Scotch heats your belly, while the acid keeps everything bright. Adds Lucca-Flaherty, "The honey and the ginger certainly scream out for an itchy sweater." It's an effective elixir against colder weather, though it probably won't help if it burns when you pee.

Tickle Your Fancy

Not all villages are created equal (see Bay and Greenwich). But when it comes to breakfast sandwiches, Boston can compete. That's thanks to Mike Fitzhenry and Patty Sinaiko of the eponymous cafe on Church Street. The pair's bacon and egg, "fancy," comes with cheddar, avocado, red onion and house mayo. Prepared in their shoebox storefront, with a bespectacled Fitzhenry behind the counter, the operation is begging to be a stop on a bus tour. Hollywood East, are you listening?

ELIZABETH BOMZE

Question for Alex Palermo

What are five predictions for Boston in 2009?

Palermo is a psychic at the Original Tremont Tearoom in Boston.

1. Tom Brady and Gisele Bündchen will still be together as he wades through the depression of [his injury]. He will embark on a career in performing.
2. The fallout from the Dianne Wilkerson scandal will lead to other allegations of corruption.
3. None of Boston's main sports teams will be in any championship. However, the Red Sox will come close again.
4. Massachusetts' home prices and sales will continue to be above the national average.
5. A major shakeup in the Boston TV news scene will occur and a long-time favorite could be exiting.

GIVE 'EM L

Because the short-lived Boston Public adhered to the Wesley Snipes theory of taxation, Restaurant L has returned to Louis Boston, this time under the direction of Marc Orfaly. The menu has been referred to as his greatest hits, good news for fans of Pigalle and Marco but potentially stifling for the chef. "People start to associate you with a certain style, and it's hard to break out of that," he concedes.

While you'll find Pigalle's spicy tuna rolls ($18) on the Asian-inspired bar menu and entrees like Marco's spaghetti con pomodoro ($18), there are also new creations: a scallop-crusted black bass ($35), a slow-cooked short rib with stewed kimchee ($28), and an artichoke heart stuffed with squab and chicken mousse ($30).

Thank Nantucket for the fresh ideas. While Bostonians lounged on the beach, Orfaly cooked for them at the Summer House. "The clientele is very similar—'Sconsit has to be one of the wealthiest zip codes in the world, and we definitely get some high-end clientele here," he says, comparing the Nantucket hot spot and tony Back Bay retailer. "As a maturing chef, it was great for me. It was very refreshing to cook in a new style. All chefs are looking to recreate and reinvent themselves."

It's summer inspiration in time for winter. "Being in that environment really helped prepare me for what I wanted to do [here]," Orfaly explains. "I really wanted to keep it fun and lighthearted."

CLASSROOM CRUSH

TO JON THE T.A.: I have admired you from the back of the class for the entire semester. You have such a dark, mysterious way about you, the strong silent type. I dream of hanging your track jacket on my coat rack. You've made learning the basics of management more than just a boring prerequisite. You've made it a weekly occasion that I look forward to. I overheard you talking about your fondness for penguins once, and I, too, share an affection for those aerodynamically-challenged birds. I know that it would be inappropriate to confess my true feelings while you're still technically my teacher, but as the semester ends and the days of coming to office hours become a thing of the past, maybe you'll finally see me for who I really am. It could be a learning experience for the both of us.

Yes, it's 5:30 pm and dark outside. That makes not only you but all of us commuters even more tired after a cold day of work in the city. But not even the disastrous weather could justify your impoliteness while trying to hold on to an extra seat for your own personal comfort. I understand that sometimes touching shoulders with a complete stranger can be awkward, but you would've survived. The train was packed. Next time, get over it. Stop pretending you didn't notice the line of people coming in and move your Coach bag to the floor.

For the meter maid at Harvard Square on Monday nights:
Because of a delay of two minutes, you gave me a $25 parking ticket. Seriously? My car was parked in front of Pizzeria Uno while I went Christmas shopping. Unfortunately, things didn't go as I'd planned, and more people than I imagined were doing the same that night. Consequently, I got stuck in a giant line. When I finally got to the car, it was too late. Two minutes late. I hope when you get to checking off your own gift list, you take the T, because what they say about karma could be true. Most of all, I hope you get some holiday spirit in the next few weeks.

Secret Santa

To the woman at the Y Chinatown this morning:
You must be terribly important [to refuse to] take less than ONE minute [out] of your day to go just around the corner to the front desk to get me another towel, as mine had fallen on the floor and was completely and totally drenched. "No, I have a meeting," you said, as I stood there soaking, cold and naked. You, fully dressed, proceeded to take your time putting on makeup and doing your hair, while I stood shivering, waiting and hoping that someone else would enter the locker room and help me out. Luckily, a kind person came in and got me another towel. Next time I see YOU in the shower, I might decide to give your towel a bath in the toilet.

Beauty

ALL EYES ON YOU

Finding the right mascara can take a lifetime. But who has time to peruse the aisles and poll the general public in hopes of finding the perfect tube? I do. Below is my highly scientific review of five popular brands. AMANDA KNORR

Big Fatty Mascara by Urban Decay $19; Phenomen'Eyes Mascara by Givenchy $27; and Publicity Stunt Lashes by Lorac $19. All at Sephora, Prudential Center, Boston (617-262-4200) sephora.com. Great Lash Mascara by Maybelline $4.79 at CVS, 587 Boylston St., Boston (617-437-8414) cvs.com. High Impact Curling Mascara by Clinique $14 at Saks Fifth Avenue, Prudential Center, Boston (617-262-8500) saks.com.

	Length	Curl	Volume	Smudge Proof	Easy Removal	Soft Feel	Verdict
Clinique	✓	✓	✓	✓	✓	✓	My favorite of the group by far. See chart for details.
Givenchy	✓	✓	✓	✗	✓	✗	The brush is so fun—I can overlook the smudge factor.
Lorac 	✓	✗	✗	✓	✗	✗	Dry and stubborn. If you don't want noticeable lashes, it's perfect.
Maybelline	✓	✗	✓	✗	✓	✓	Overrated. It always gives me terrible raccoon eyes.
Urban Decay	✓	✗	✓	✗	✓	✓	More natural than "Big Fatty" indicates. Love the bottle.

BODY AND MIND

On medicine and movement

Picture of Health

MUMBLING "OM" during yoga seems like the cozy purr of the mind infusing the body with healing, possibly counteracting Western medicine, which some regard suspiciously as cold and heartless. In her new book, Anne Harrington takes a thoughtful tour through variations on these themes over the course of history. One tale features Jesus driving out demons, using religious exorcism to rid bodily toxins. Later, charlatan/showman Franz Anton Mesmer claimed to manipulate invisible magnetic fluids, causing convulsions and, sometimes, miraculous cures. Sigmund Freud, assuming some bodily complaints were "speaking" repressed thoughts, invited the examined life of psychoanalysis. Norman Vincent Peale sold The Power of Positive Thinking, with its zestifying name, to millions. The companionship of support groups for cancer patients is another story. Curative? Maybe not, but certainly consoling. Then came Eastern journeys of meditation, mystically imbued with maharishi flavors, later demystified to become the practical relaxation response. Same destination, many fascinating routes. The Cure Within: A History of Mind-Body Medicine is by Anne Harrington, professor and chair of the history of science at Harvard.

A LEG UP LEARN NEW MOVES IN DANCE CLASS.

Cheek to Cheek

UP HIGH AS A TREETOP, this studio in a spacious Cambridge factory building offers classes for amateurs, aspiring competitors and couples choreographing their wedding-day numbers. Some study just for the athletic benefits of learning to move well. Recently, Helle Rusholt-Yi, who owns Extreme Dancesport with her husband, Steve Yi, worked with a twosome who uses class as a "date night" way to connect. Charmingly chatty and glamorous, Rusholt-Yi taught them the flickering mathematics of various steps, correcting, questioning, demonstrating, encouraging and laughing along the way. Her close direction keeps things lively. In group drills, students circle round, incorporating the basic "muscle memory" of numerous steps and maneuvers. For those lacking a partner, pro instructors join in. Rusholt-Yi points out the masculine aspect, with the man leading and the woman flowing along in response. There's salsa, samba and swing, to name a few. Whatever the style, extreme dancing is, at the very least, extremely engaging.

Extreme Dancesport (288 Norfolk St., 3rd floor, Cambridge; 617-492-2122; extremedancesport.com) offers individual, group and couple classes.

La Leche League

Call it dairy Darwinism. Along with other formerly forbidden foods like Sichuan peppercorns and jamón ibérico, raw milk seems to have staying power. It's been a quiet revolution so far—don't expect to find the truly fresh stuff in your local supermarket yet—but fans have banged their glasses loud enough to get the number of state-certified farms up to 24. They include the folks behind Just Dairy, a Boston-area buying club. Choose from 14 pickup points; gallon and half-gallon jugs are dropped off weekly at volunteer homes from Beverly to Brookline.

INTRIGUE IS OUT

IF YOU'VE GOT IT, flaunt it. Especially, says Daniel Bruce, executive chef at the Boston Harbor Hotel, if you're a restaurant whose "it" includes a fabulous waterfront location.

"It's on the water!" Bruce says of the first-floor Intrigue Café, which will close in January and be replaced by a seafood-themed restaurant—with a name to match—in March. He reveals that the new spot is more of a destination eatery, with a "fish-focused," frequently-changing menu. Costs will be moderate, he says, "but the quality and value will be ratcheted way up" compared with similarly-priced venues.

PREPARING TO KICK OFF the annual Boston Wine Festival Jan. 10, Bruce plans to add a twist to the event he started 20 years ago. After creating about 3,400 dinners (at his count) without repeating a single dish, this year he'll bring back some old favorites. They'll accompany winemakers' vintages from the festival's first year.

WAY BACK IN OCTOBER 2000, when Radius co-owners Christopher Myers and chef Michael Schlow hosted the Robert Mondavi Culinary Award of Excellence Dinner, the most captivating topic of conversation wasn't the illustrious company—which included Mondavi and Julia Child—but the imminent opening of Copia in California's Napa Valley. Also known as the American Center for Wine, Food and the Arts, Copia comprises a museum, gallery, educational spaces, restaurants and acres of organic gardens. A money-loser since opening in 2001, the center filed for Chapter 11 on Dec. 1. Can you say bailout?

TO CALL THE extraordinary development of the Boston restaurant scene over the past 20 years a culinary renaissance would presume that the cuisine had a classic period. Not really. But if it had, Lydia Shire, Jasper White and Michaela Larson could be called the Leonardo, Michelangelo and Dante of its gastronomic reawakening. And Charles Draghi, a talented chef whose pioneering work at Marcuccio's in the late '90s breached the North End's veil of red sauce, continues their palate-pleasing mission. Most recently, Draghi worked as a waiter at No. 9 Park, but his recent opening of Erbaluce in Bay Village puts him back at the helm. Named for a grape varietal (translating into "dawn light"), the Italian restaurant serves superb, sophisticated food at reasonable prices in a welcoming environment.

Draghi has a flair for coaxing maximum flavor out of first-rate, local ingredients. He's also skilled in deploying herbs and creating sauces that enhance rather than mask. Endive tastes like endive, duck like duck, chicken like chicken. Tucking into a Draghi main course is like listening to a concerto, where other instruments complement the principal theme articulated by the piano or violin; every now and then a few solo measures from a flute or oboe captivate and delight.

As if to set the stage for the performance at Erbaluce, a lovely lima-bean puree, with nutmeg, cinnamon, oregano and a touch of roasted garlic, accompanied house-baked foccaccia on our visits. An amuse-bouche of lobster and cod one night, salmon and scallop another, further heralded good things to come. Of the appetizers, razor clams steamed with green peppercorns, leeks and white wine ($10) grabbed our attention, their elongated shells dominating the shallow bowl they shared with delicious broth and herbed toasts. The subtle flavor of the leeks and gentle heat of the peppercorns enhanced the marvelous mollusks. Roasted white turnips ($9), their sugars slightly caramelized, were combined with taleggio cheese, capers and a hint of anchovy. In a partial reprise of the amuse-bouche, fresh, sweet crab and poached cod ($8) featured a delectable, spicy aioli. Finally, three grilled Portuguese sardines ($9) came crowned with a piquant agrodolce of red and yellow pepper strips. While it took some work to remove their spines (which many folks find perfectly edible), the effort proved worthwhile in the substantial yield of rich, firm flesh.

Pastas, Draghi's strong suit, included pansoti ($17); an exquisite walnut-lemon-thyme pesto complemented the ravioli stuffed with greens and ricotta. Spaghi with local clams ($18) in a bronze fennel broth, sprinkled with bottarga di muggine (red mullet roe, a Sardinian specialty), was tasty, but suffered from slightly overcooked pasta. No such problem with the potato-and-oregano gnocchi ($22) in a robust ragout of wild boar and vegetables.

Many otherwise inviting Italian restaurants excel in their antipasti and pasta only to falter with the main courses. Not so Erbaluce. If anything, they met and even exceeded the high standards of what preceded them. Entrees ranged from something as simple as a small roast chicken (pollestrello) with lemon and oregano stuffing ($21), its skin crisp and its flesh juicy, to the more ambitious undertaking of duckling done two ways: tender, rare and succulent sauteed breast and slow-roasted leg ($27). Savory, rice-stuffed cabbage rolls and roasted red pepper, bay leaf and pink-peppercorn sauce accompanied the duck.

The seafood also lived up to our expectations. Porbeagle ($21), a species of shark, was grilled with mace and tarragon, then finished with heirloom tomatoes and leeks. Twin native mackerel ($19), broiled with olive oil, fresh bay leaves and lemon, straddled the plate in parallel, accompanied by sauteed yellow peppers, fennel and basil. Lamb and veal continued the triumphs. The lamb ($28), roasted with sweet spices, came with a rosemary-and-onion sauce and a garnish of tender lima beans and full-flavored chard. The lemon-and-marjoram–roasted veal loin ($26), first-rate in itself, was almost eclipsed by a braised endive, a delectable and overlooked vegetable too often confined to salads.

After such a repast, desserts seemed superfluous, but I'm glad we didn't miss the lemon-and-nutmeg panna cotta ($8). Wine selections included a Kyos 2007 Nero d'Avola ($28), fruity but with good acidity, and a 2003 La Lastra Colli Senesi ($32), a mellow Tuscan red with a fine bouquet. Erbaluce's simple but tasteful decor and service also made the mark. Waiters remained attentive and efficient as the sparsely populated dining room filled to capacity by 7 pm one Saturday evening, sending overflow to the bar. Apparently the secret is out. ×××

BLACKED OUT

Sick curiosity sends our writer shopping the day after Thanksgiving.

I'VE NEVER GONE shopping the day after Thanksgiving. There are just a lot of things I'd rather do—skinny dip in the ocean off the coast of Newfoundland, join a cult, practice self-immolation, that kind of thing. Shopping never makes the cut, because I only have so much time, and I've got to prioritize. You know, it takes a little while to find someone on the Internet who's willing to waterboard you.

But this year, motivated by sick curiosity, I decide to venture out to area merchants on Black Friday. I head to Best Buy first, since it has a 32-inch flatscreen TV for $399. Or at least, it did at 5 am when doors opened to the inhuman cretins who'd show up at Best Buy at 5 am. Now the store is a carcass picked clean by the soulless barbarians of the South Shore. A salesman says he's out of the $399 TVs, but reassures a woman next to me that those TVs were really crappy anyway. Instead she grabs an extremely regular-priced Samsung and heads to the register (ah, I think I'm gleaning the Secret of the Doorbuster here). Meanwhile, I wander over to a display adjacent to the TV department, where I discover a stack of the $399 TVs that somehow escaped notice. Uh oh.

I don't even need a TV, but the Black Friday mania is sweeping through my system. I... I could buy 10 of these and sell them in the parking lot! Yes! Or I could just keep them all and have a 32-inch TV in every room of my house. I could install one down near the floor in the kitchen so that my dog could watch TV while he eats. For this price, I should replace all my windows with flat-screen TVs showing a video feed of the world outside. For this price, I could use a couple as toboggans this winter and a couple to smash with a hammer purely for sport.

Then I realize I already have a TV in the living room, a small one in the kitchen, plus my computer, which can also be a TV via the Slingbox. But I can't leave Best Buy, because two women pushing strollers have blocked off either end of my aisle. I assume they work for Best Buy, and they're going to stay there until I agree to buy something. I wait them out while pretending to peruse bargain-bin video games with names like Pro Curling 2002 for Genesis.

I think I'm gleaning the Secret of the Doorbuster.

When I finally break free and head out the door, the security guards eye me as if I'm hiding a 32-inch TV in my pants. Did you know that if you leave a store on Black Friday without buying anything, you're automatically subject to a strip search? It's true. Tell all your friends to send urgent e-mails about it, because I'm still trying to start an Internet rumor and nobody's picked up on my story that Sam Houston's last will and testament requires Mexico to become a U.S. state in 2012.

From Best Buy I'm off to the Derby Street Shoppes in Hingham to see what I'll find. It soon becomes obvious that one thing I won't find is a parking spot. But I should've expected that. Because I watch the news, I know that there are two ways Black Friday can play out. One possibility is that the economy is good, so all the stores are mobbed. The other scenario is that the economy is bad, and people care extra-hard about finding bargains, so all the stores are mobbed. Either way, you're confronted with a crush of consumers grabbing useless things for their stupid families. Have I mentioned that maybe I don't have the proper disposition for shopping on the day after Thanksgiving?

I head into Kohl's first. Stacked in the aisles, they have boxes upon boxes of compact stereos that will record your vinyl records onto CDs or cassette tapes. I marvel at this device like I would an unopened bottle of Crystal Pepsi. It's on sale for $229.99. Clearly, Kohl's needs to get some new delivery drivers, because this shipment was due in 1993.

Then again, how many times have you been listening to your Walkman and wished you could play your Beatles LPs without buying a whole new music library? Exactly! The CD burner, though, is kind of irrelevant, because I'm not about to convert my music to a format that might not be around for long. I mean, with the pace of modern technology, I'm sure they'll think of something to replace the compact disc soon.

I stumble out of Kohl's and glance around at the stores ringing the parking lot, but my feet lead me right back to my car: I'm done. I'm not strong enough to survive the crucible of day-after-Thanksgiving shopping. And frankly, I don't understand why anyone else bothers, either. If you're a hardcore bargain-hunter, why not simply go to a place where things are cheap all the time, like TJ Maxx or China? Why deal with the Black Friday nonsense?

I guess my problem is that I like buying things but hate shopping. If only there were a way for me to purchase goods without burning gas, dealing with crowds and having to wear clothes. If such an invention existed, it surely would end the madness of Black Friday, for what kind of morons would willfully subject themselves to that misery with an easy alternative at hand? Oh, well. I guess I'd better start preparing now for next year. I'm going to break out my LPs and use my new record player to make the best Black Friday mix tape ever. ✖✖✖

I'VE GOT A LITTLE LIST

Memorable books, meals and more

Jean Leon/Getty Images

I HAVE A FAVORITE STORY about the economic winds swirling around us. It involves a female friend, who called after the market had plunged and said, "This is worse than divorce." "Why?" I asked. "I've lost half of my net worth," she said, "but I've still got my husband." With that humor in mind, here are some of my favorite diversions from the dangerous year of 2008.

They include food, entertainment and ideas that afforded me a temporary escape. I read a quote recently from Harold Bloom, a Yale professor who believes he's more literate than anyone on the planet. In certain ways he reminds me of the English scholar's version of Alan Greenspan: Somewhat incomprehensible, they're two versions of "The Emperor's New Clothes." But Bloom does have a wonderful line about books: "We read to repair our solitude." I grabbed this quote from a delicious memoir about Oxford: This Secret Garden by Justin Cartwright, a novelist who'll get you thinking about the stuff that makes us both absurd and noble.

For the thriller and adventure fans, I offer Stephen Hunter's Night of Thunder. Hunter, a former film critic for The Washington Post, has a great eye. He's probably the best writer today on weaponry of all kinds. Another of his novels, Dirty White Boys, shouldn't be missed. Speaking of great eyes and ears, there's none better than Tom Perrotta. His latest, The Abstinence Teacher, also makes my list. Of course, anything new from the Big Engine That Can, as I call Robert Parker, is worth checking out. Go see the movie adaptation of his novel Appaloosa and then read the new Spenser series installment in bed. Parker is an addiction that's actually good for you. If what he creates seems simple, think again.

My last reading recommendation is the Kindle, Amazon's wireless tool. When it comes to books, I'm a junkie. I like their look, feel and smell; I've been known to reevaluate relationships with non-readers. So I never expected to endorse the e-book experience. But recently, at least five people I respect got the Kindle as presents (at $359, it's not cheap) and became converts. Like the first time I ever had a mixed drink. I couldn't believe how funny and clever it made me... and I've never looked back. Light and compact, the Kindle is great for trips. It can hold more than 200 books, magazines and newspapers.

It may be the perfect device, but there's probably no such thing as the perfect meal. Still, the memorable tastes, smells or sights of individual dishes intrigue me much like a loved one's neck, eyes or mouth. It's the small pleasures I particularly enjoy. This year's dining treats included classic crispy duck at Rialto, duck pâté at Beacon Hill Bistro, vitello tonnato at Toscano, shrimp salad with Meyer lemon and pancetta at Via Matta, soft-shell crabs at Mistral, crispy chicken livers at Davio's, seared scallops at Clio and the spicy mussels at Stella. For special wines, visit Jeanne Rogers at Il Capriccio in Waltham.

My vote for the funniest restaurant maestro: Steve DiFillipo of Davio's. And my favorite nighttime philosopher: Frank Taw at Brookline's Golden Temple. Biggest romantic in the hospitality sector? Jeffrey Moore, who tickles the ivories at the Langham Hotel bar.

Here's a throwback tip for those of you who enjoy obscure Broadway musicals. Get the CD of Andrew Lloyd Webber's Song and Dance, featuring Bernadette Peters. It's clever, sardonic and smart about all kinds of love in America. And for lovers of all things dangerous and quirky at the cinema, rent the hauntingly shot In Bruges.

Lastly, my favorite vino of 2008. Since I generally order by the label's look or the product's name, I recommend 7 Deadly Zins by Lodi Vineyards in California. It's great with steak au poivre. Clink! ×××

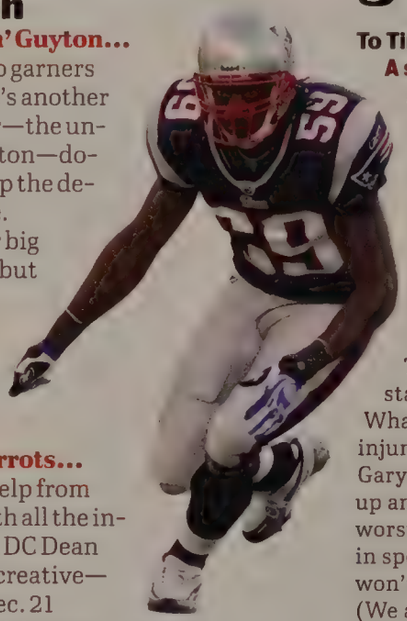
ON PRESENTS, PINSTRIPES, JORDAN AND GINO

2 THOUGHTS ON THE MLB OFFSEASON

Some seriously wide pinstripes... So does CC Sabathia's $161M include the price of the elastic waistband for his uniform or is that out of pocket? Honestly though, you can't knock the Yankees for this one. They have unlimited resources, saw a guy they wanted and broke the bank (or five banks) to get him. Good for them. Enjoy that 1-4 career postseason record.

You can watch from the dugout... This March, many of the game's greats will suit up for their respective countries at the World Baseball Classic. And while we'd never ask David Ortiz not to play, we do have one request: David, please don't play. If you can't stay healthy for 162 games, we're guessing 170-plus might be a problem.

3 Pats to Watch Down the Stretch



Look at this effin' Guyton... While Jerod Mayo garners more press, there's another rookie linebacker—the undrafted Gary Guyton—doing his part to keep the defense respectable. Belichick is never big on compliments, but he's said enough about Guyton to let you know he feels good about him.

Like pees and carrots... He'll have some help from the coach, but with all the injuries on defense, DC Dean Pees needs to get creative—particularly on Dec. 21 against Arizona. If the Pats don't figure out a way to slow down Boldin and Fitzgerald it's going to get uglier than Sam Cassell in Foxborough.

Ground Jordan... The colder it feels, the more essential the running game becomes. If the Pats have the services of a healthy LaMont Jordan, their running attack becomes far more formidable. Then again, "healthy LaMont Jordan" is like saying "awkward Ray Allen" or "sober Vin Baker." It might not last very long.

4 CELTICS QUESTIONS

Are they better this year? Yes, but if they still had James Posey, they'd be that much better. Kendrick Perkins and Rajon Rondo have taken the team to a different level, but when it comes down to it, the C's are still looking for that consistent Posey-like presence off the bench.

Will anyone average 20? The Celtics don't have a guy averaging more than 20 points a game, and since 1991, only the 2004 Pistons have won the title without a 20-point scorer. While that accomplishment would be a nice testament to the C's team philosophy, any chance to distinguish themselves from the Pistons is one worth taking.

Is Rondo an All-Star? Among Eastern Conference point guards, Rondo (at press time) ranks first in rebounds, steals, dramatic crashes and field-goal percentage, third in assists, and he scores in double figures for the best basketball team in the universe. What more do you need? World-class roller-skating skills? Ah, then you're in luck.

Is the East a two-team race? Boston and Cleveland are the cream of the crop, but don't sleep on Orlando. They've got decent depth, two deadly (and clutch) outside shooters and the most dominant center in the game. Plus, their coach looks like the love child of Ron Jeremy and Paul Bearer. That spells trouble.

5 GIFTS A GIVING

To Tim Thomas... A start in the NHL All-Star Game The NHL admits it made a mistake leaving Tim Thomas off this year's All-Star Ballot. Very sweet, but sorrys won't get Thomas into that starting lineup. What we need is an injunction. We need Gary Bettman to step up and say, "I am the worst commissioner in sports, and even I won't let this stand!" (We also need him to induct Barry Melrose's mullet into the Hall of Fame.)

To Celtics Fans... Gino Maybe Gino isn't as cool as he was last season; maybe he jumped the shark a tiny bit. But that doesn't mean we don't miss him. Last year, Gino was an addiction. He was like a bowl of Doritos sprinkled with crystal meth. And you can't just take that away. That means the Celtics need to start blowing out a few more teams. Every other game would be nice.

To Big Baby... A break When you start that first job out of college, you're guaranteed to be at least slightly scared of your boss. So we understand if Big Baby got a little emotional after being reprimanded by his boss—a 32-year-old, seven-foot monster whose hobbies include growling and banging his head against the basket support.

To the Pats... Bruce Willis in Unbreakable Wouldn't it be nice to have just one guy who can't get hurt? Bill Belichick's earned it. Of the 11 defensive players who started Week 1 against the Chiefs, only five were healthy for the end of the Seahawks game. We're not talking about minor injuries either. The Pats' IR is more crowded than Shawn Kemp's house on Father's Day.

To Dustin Pedroia... The 2009 Cy Young It's been a dominant, award-winning two seasons for our cover boy, but there's one trophy that's always eluded him. If he can't bring home the Cy Young in 2009, people are going to wonder if he ever will.

DATE TO WATCH

There are games, there are big games and then there's Christmas Day 2008: Celtics vs. Lakers. L.A.'s had six months to stew over the finals; the Celtics have had three months of hearing how Kobe and Co. are the team to beat. Today, it all comes to a head. This one's so big that Pau Gasol just upgraded his pre-game bikini wax to a Brazilian.

STELLA ARTOIS

Perfection HAS ITS PLACE

A perfectly poured Stella Artois is the Gold Standard of Belgian beer.

Step One THE PURIFICATION

The bartender selects the signature glass for the beer being poured. The glass is scrubbed in a cool-water bath, preferably with a mild detergent. It's then rinsed with cold water to chill the glass.

Step Two THE SACRIFICE

The tap is opened in one swift motion to let the first burst of foam flow away. It must never enter the glass, thus ensuring every drop of beer is fresh.

Step Three THE LIQUID ALCHEMY

The glass is held at a 45-degree angle to create the perfect balance of liquid to foam.

Step Four THE HEAD

The head is created by straightening and lowering the glass. The foam is visually appealing and releases the beer's aroma.

Step Five THE REMOVAL

Step Six THE BEHEADING

While the beer is flowing over the edge of the glass, the bartender cuts the head gently with a head cutter at a 45-degree angle. This eliminates the larger bubbles that burst easily and accelerate the dissipation of the head.

Step Seven THE JUDGMENT

Step Eight THE CLEANSING

The bartender then rinses the bottom and sides of the glass. This keeps the glass clean and cool and makes it comfortable to hold.

Step Nine THE BESTOWAL

Soroff On BANG CAMARO

The founders of the hard-rock band discuss their origins, their choir and Guitar Hero II.

FOUNDED BY GUITARISTS BRYN BENNETT AND ALEX NECOCHEA, rock phenomenon Bang Camaro consists of a core group of five musicians and a choir of anywhere from six to 20 members. Inspired by 1980s heavy metal and indulging in long, twisty guitar solos evoking that era, the band's cult following has blossomed nationwide. Their unique sound has earned them ink in Billboard, Playgirl, Rolling Stone and Spin. Songs from their first self-titled album have been used in numerous commercials and film soundtracks, wildly popular video games like Guitar Hero II and Rock Band, and are now standard fare at Bruins and Celtics games. Their sophomore album, Bang Camaro II, was released locally in November and drops nationally next month. Bennett and Necochea live in Boston.

Jonathan Soroff: Who came up with the name of the band?
Bryn Bennett: It started when Alex and I were in an indie-rock band around Boston, and we got kind of bored of always talking about our feelings. We wanted to wear some leather pants and get girls to start coming to our shows, so I suggested we start a hard-rock band called Bang Camaro.
Alex Necochea: We originally wanted to go with Pizza Party but that was taken.

Five band members and 20 lead singers—was that the plan or did it just happen?
AN: It wasn't a planned concept. Bryn and I got together and determined we were both closet metalheads in a small town, and we set about writing these songs with really big choruses and big guitar hooks and bass and drums. Not knowing any better, to get that big vocal sound we brought all our friends into the studio. I think we probably finished off 150–200 beers in that first session. Then we put the songs online, and it resonated with people.

Have you ever heard the criticism that it's gimmicky?
BB: We hear that from time to time. At our shows, we'll see that one guy, the hipster who's too cool to be there, and maybe his girlfriend dragged him, and she comes and rocks out in the front row. He'll stand there for a while and try to figure out if we're a joke or not, but by the end, he's headbanging right along with us. People know we're not joking around when they come to a show.

First concert each of you ever saw?
BB: My friend's older brother took me to see Cinderella when I was really young, in Rochester, N.Y. A bunch of heavy-metal girls threw beer on me, and I thought it was the best night of my life.
AN: The first show I remember seeing was on the campus of UMass when I was really little. My dad was friends with this band called the Sex Execs. I remember my older brother got tagged in the kidney with a flying apple.

Would you call yourselves a hair band?
AN: Absolutely not. We definitely have hair. But we're not a hair band.

OK, but who has the best hair?
AN: Definitely Pete [McCarthy]. He's our own little Dale Crover [of the Melvins].
BB: We caught a video of them playing the other night, and we were like, "Holy shit! That looks just like Pete!"

Does anyone in the band actually drive a Camaro?
BB: A couple of years ago, the guys in the band surprised me with a black, '89 T-top Camaro. It unfortunately sat in my driveway for a couple of years. As I accepted my [destitute] lot playing in this band full-time, I eventually had to get rid of it.

Playgirl picked you as one of its top buzz bands of the year. Which one of you is the most likely to pose for them?
AN: Zack Given. We were doing a photo shoot in New York with Playgirl, where they were just taking pictures of us before we performed. Then they were trying to do the, like, "Hey, wouldn't it be a little more comfortable if you took your shirts off?" I was like, "Hell, no!" and then I look back and Zack already has his shirt off, ready to go.
BB: All they had to say was naked, and he was naked.

If you blow up to Beatles proportions and girls are freaking out, chasing you around, how will 25 guys safely get away?
BB: It's like storming the beaches of Normandy. We may lose a couple of guys in the process.

So it's every man for himself?
BB: That's the advantage of safety in numbers. We haven't managed to leave anybody on the side of the road yet, but shit happens.
AN: Why were the Beatles always running away from girls? I'd run toward them. Then again, they tend to run away from me.

In the cosmic scheme of things, how important is Guitar Hero*?*
BB: Guitar Hero and Rock Band have been amazing for us. But the downside is that we've gone to shows where they're having Rock Band Night, and people will challenge us on our own songs, and they just wipe the floor with us.

Think the Rolling Stones would've been better off with 20 Mick Jaggers?
BB: I'm not sure they were better off with one. I'm a Beatles guy.
AN: I think 20 Keith Richards would be where it's at. Imagine the parties!

Biggest difference between playing live and recording with so many people?
AN: Recording is a lot easier to get together because we don't have to corral 20 guys into a van and take them somewhere. Since Bryn and I live together, I can just get up, scratch my ass, go kick his door and say, "Let's go play guitar!" We can be 14 again. Then we take it all down to the studio and invite the guys.

With so many band members, do you borrow any of the logistics from classical orchestras?
AN: That'd be a lot of work. We try to just plug our guitars in and have a good time, but we do have a lot of vocal harmony that goes on in our shows. A lot of people think the singers just go out there and scream, but it's really not true. So I wouldn't say things are to the level of an orchestra, but they are a bit more complex than people might think.

Last question: How many earplugs do you go through in a week?
AN: There's no earplugs in rock 'n' roll. ✖✖✖

SECOND'S BEST

Dustin Pedroia seals the deal.

By Rich Levine
Photograph by Kerry Brett

Here's what you already know about Dustin Pedroia. You know that Pedroia's on the small side, that he takes flak for his size, and that he uses it to fuel an engine that obliterates American League pitching.

You also know that he likes trophies. Despite a career that barely predates the iPhone, Pedroia's already won a World Series ring, Rookie of the Year, a Silver Slugger Award, a Golden Glove and, most recently, the AL MVP. The 5' 9" second baseman also just signed a six-year deal with the Red Sox worth $40.5 million.

Lastly, you know that he's a wiseass.

Scratch that. You think that he's a wiseass. In reality—or at least in his reality—Pedroia's merely a victim.

"I just want to clear something up right now," the married MVP told us from his off-season home in Arizona. "When it comes to talking trash, I get it far worse than I give it. The other guys are all over me about 100 times more often than the other way around. I just have to respond to what everyone's saying to me. It's all just retaliation."

Who gives him the most crap?

"Well, it's pretty much all 25 guys, plus the manager, plus the rest of the staff."

OK, maybe we'll just take his word for it. After all, there's a more pressing issue at hand: motivation. What the 25-year-old has accomplished after only two seasons in the big leagues is akin to summiting Everest on your first hike. Success isn't supposed to come that quickly, and you have to wonder: Now that Pedroia has nobody left to prove wrong, what does he have left to prove?

"Winning is all I need," he says. "You know, 2007 was a great experience for me. It was the best experience of my life. And 2008, yeah, it was a great year but the only thing is winning championships.

"I don't want to call last season a failure, but that's what it feels like. We went out to win a World Series, and to come one game away from making it there is tough. It's all just motivation."

Speaking of that World Series... well, there's not much to say. While we went into denial—boycotting talk radio, avoiding SportsCenter, V-chipping Fox—Pedroia sat on his couch, pissed off as hell, and watched it.

"Yeah, I watched it," he admits. "I watched as a fan of the game, but I also like to watch games just to get better. You know, just because I've played in the World Series doesn't mean I know everything about playing in a World Series. So I'm trying to get better by watching those guys. I'm always learning."

Learning and working. When the season ended, Pedroia headed to Arizona and took a whopping three days off. He slept late, pigged out, caught some movies ("I saw Saw V, and it was probably the worst movie ever. How many times can someone die in the same movie?"). But then it was back to business.

"I definitely want to be in there for every game in 2009. That only comes with hard work, and that's what I'm focused on."

"I know it's a long season," he says, "and I definitely want to be in there for every game in 2009. That only comes with hard work, and that's what I'm focused on."

But before we get to 2009, there are still a few Hot Stove matters to address. In November, David Ortiz suggested the Sox needed more bullpen help and another 30-homer guy. Will the team make a move? Pedroia can't be bothered.

"You know what? I don't really know. I don't get paid to make decisions like that, and I don't think David does either. I hear about that stuff, but you can't control it. All I can do is focus on 2009, and if something happens in the meantime, we'll make that adjustment."

Same goes for any questions about the Sox' budding rivalry with the Rays. Will next year's games with Tampa reach the level of intensity usually reserved for the Yankees? Pedroia's not biting.

"We're thinking about Tampa first, but that's just because we open the season with them. That's the biggest thing right now. Just getting off on the right track. That's all we're worried about."

He clearly cares about one thing: winning baseball games. Any of the drama that comes with winning is just white noise—unless, of course, that drama involves a player running his mouth. Then it's on. ***

AN UNTRAINED DANCER TAKES TO THE STAGE.

BY JONATHAN SOROFF PHOTOGRAPHS BY ERIC ANTONIOU

As the song from A Chorus Line goes, "Everything is beautiful at the ballet." Except for me, that is. I never really wanted to be in the ballet. Especially not The Nutcracker. Don't get me wrong: I love to watch ballet and go see shows whenever possible.

But by the time Dec. 1 rolled around, I was always so sick of the score, I wanted to dig up Tchaikovsky and bitch-slap him. As far as I was concerned, it was an old chestnut that had been roasting over an open fire for way too long. Even before the holiday season started, it burned my ass. I viewed it as the inescapable, anodyne soundtrack of overheated malls and escalators full of mouth-breathing troglodytes trying—in a desperate, obligation-induced haze—to buy gifts for people they truly didn't care about.

So it was with reluctance, to say the least, that I accepted an assignment to appear in The Nutcracker with the Boston Ballet.

In fact, I was half-hoping that the whole thing would prove impractical, that they'd say, "Only if you can make every single rehearsal" (which, of course, I couldn't, since I strongly suspect that would have conflicted with my daily viewing of The Price Is Right).

Imagine my chagrin, then, when I phoned artistic director Mikko Nissenen and said, "My editor has the most idiotic idea, but I figured I'd run it by you," and he responded in that mischievous Finnish accent, "I love it! But I don't think I'll have you do the normal supernumerary thing, like the chestnut vendor. Let me give it some thought."

Two days later, Nissenen called back to say, "I'm going to have you dance Mother Ginger in two performances."

Dance?!?

I never said I could dance.

I figured I'd be standing in the corner, hoisting a foam-rubber goblet and pretending it was Christmas.

Even worse, when I reacquainted myself with the sickly-sweet holiday spectacle, I realized that the role of Mother Ginger entailed three other talents that were glaringly absent from my repertoire:

1. Walking on stilts.
2. Dressing in drag (OK, so I've done it a few times, but it was ugly).
3. Escorting a horde of small children onstage underneath my skirt.

This last skill seemed like the most practical to learn, in case the current economy forces me to move to Texas and resort to smuggling undocumented Mexicans across the border. The rest was a triumph of the ill-conceived over the ill-advised—easily the most harebrained thing I'd ever attempted.

But then I thought, "Mikko knows what he's doing." Nissenen runs a world-class ballet company. He isn't about to risk ruining two performances of a major cash cow just for a bit of ink in a magazine that (truth be told) is to ballet what Popular Mechanics is to the folks at NASA.

If he thought I could do it, I could.

It would just require practice, a higher-than-normal dosage of Xanax, and resigning myself to the fact that I'd be sharing the stage with a character named "Drosselmeier." (I mean, why not call yourself "Dreckburger," for Christ's sake?)

At this point, I should mention that my only strong association with the Mother Ginger scene came from the time my mother (may she rest in peace) took my two nieces to see The Nutcracker. As a favor, an old friend dropped them off at the theater and said to my younger niece, Erica, "My favorite part is when the children come running out from under the giant lady's skirt." Lord knows what Erica heard, but when I picked them up two hours later, my poor mother looked like she'd been shoveling coal in the boiler room of an ocean liner. Erica had been so frightened at the prospect of Mother Ginger that my mom couldn't pry her off long enough to remove her fur coat in the overheated theater.

So even without the yearly musical barrage, The Nutcracker was fraught with treacly unpleasantness, much like a fruitcake... or the dance of the sugar plum fairies, which I always suspected was a conspiracy between PFLAG and the American Dental Association.

Yet in for a penny, in for a pound, as they say. Since I agreed to do it, I decided to remain upbeat and optimistic about the whole thing.

I arrived for my first rehearsal with a lump of dread in my throat, but was greeted warmly by ballet master Anthony Randazzo and Howard Merlin of the costume shop, who would both prove to be my biggest cheerleaders and after whom I should probably name my first born child. (Randazzo Merlin Soroff has a nice ring to it, don't you think?) Wrangling me into a pair of plasterer's stilts, they allowed me to lurch and wobble around the studio, and then explained the role to me. The Freudian implications of a 10-foot man in drag walking onstage and giving birth to eight little polichinelles (whatever the hell that means), and then doing a little waltz was too disturbing to contemplate, so I decided not to question it very closely. (However, a posthumous memo is in order to ETA Hoffmann—the nutbag who wrote the story on which The Nutcracker is based: You should have sought professional help.) An accompanist played the music from the scene, and I took my first pathetic stab at stumbling through it, to what struck me as unwarranted praise from Randazzo and Merlin.

"You're a natural!" Randazzo said. He was right, insofar as there's anything natural about wearing four-foot stilts and a dress roughly the size of a Special Needs school bus with eight small children hiding underneath. It was the kids, or more specifically, the likelihood that I would permanently maim one of them, that terrified me the most.

For the next week or so, I practiced on the stilts until it was time for me to visit wig master Jason Allen for a fitting of the ridiculous-looking yak-hair meringue that would be perched atop my head.

"You're going to be so sparkly, you'll still be picking glitter out of your eyelashes on New Year's Eve!"

"I'm going to make you look gorgeous!" Allen said, about as convincingly as a plastic surgeon talking to repeat-customer octogenarians. "You're going to be so sparkly, you'll still be picking glitter out of your eyelashes on New Year's Eve!" Well, I figured, at least that beats watching the ball drop in Times Square.

Manager of costumes and wardrobe Charles Heightchew then tried to fit me into the bodice of the costume, which was like trying to squeeze 20 pounds of sausage into a five-pound casing. Suffice it to say that I'm a bit more full-figured than your average ballet dancer. "Oh well," Heightchew said gamely, with characteristic understatement. "We'll just have to let it out a bit."

I felt like Scarlett O'Hara getting bound into her corset as I tried on the costume for the first time. Being trussed into the bodice made breathing a bit of a challenge (not exactly what you're looking for in an outfit you're expected to perform in). On my way out the door, I was advised to bring candy to bribe the polichinelles.

"They're monsters!" one of the dressers teased. "I call them the polichinevils!" On that note, it was time for my first real run-through.

Outside the studio, 24 adorable little girls in leotards sat patiently. They looked like a lawsuit waiting to happen.

"Have you ever done this before?" asked one.

"Did you ever take ballet?" asked another.

They peppered me with questions, and I tried to win them over, swearing repeatedly that I had no desire to give any of them a permanent spinal-chord injury. Rather than reassuring me, they did what all little girls do, namely laugh in my face. Thank God for Christopher Hird, their handler, who could simply utter the word "girls" in his charming English accent, and they'd immediately fall into line. Nissenen stopped by for a chuckle at my expense, and the rehearsal went about as well as one could have hoped, especially since Drosselmeier, played by saintly soloist Jared Redick, boosted my confidence by telling me that I danced well ("well" is apparently a relative term). When it was over, Randazzo said, "So we'll see you at the dress rehearsal."

"If you don't take your makeup off after the show, you could work any corner in Chinatown."

"What?!?" I said, trying to disguise my panic. "That's it?"

"Oh, do you want more rehearsal time?"

That was a bit like asking Michael Jackson if he'd like a few polichinelles to come to Neverland Ranch for a slumber party, but unflappable rehearsal scheduler Shannon Parsley took pity on me and penciled me in for a few more sessions.

Before I knew it, the day of the dress rehearsal arrived, and I entered the Opera House through the stage door, which might have made me feel cool and important if I hadn't been sick to my stomach. Despite the fact that literally everyone at the ballet—from the administrators, to the dancers, to the stage hands, dressers, crew and even the little girls—had been nothing but supportive, welcoming and kind to me, I was close to vomiting out of sheer terror.

As instructed, I squeezed into my bodice and then reported for hair and makeup at the top of intermission. Next I was ushered upstairs to backstage left, where I sat on a giant stool while the stilts were strapped to my legs. (I should point out that I'd invested in braces after noticing piercing pain in my knees after rehearsal.) Stagehands lowered the skirt from the rafters, and I was guided over to it and steadied while stepping into the opening at the center. Then the dressers and stagehands lifted it up and attached me to 35 pounds of lace and frippery on a metal superstructure. I felt like a cyborg awaiting gender reassignment surgery. A lighting tower was removed to make room for my entrance and the polichinelles were loaded in. And then we did our thing, the only minor mishap occurring when I exited through the wrong fly, nearly taking a piece of the scenery with me and no doubt giving everyone backstage heart palpitations.

"You did great!" they all said, although when pressed everyone I asked admitted that I looked a bit like a dead man walking and at the very least could have smiled more.

So all that was left was to actually do it in front of an audience, and D-Day arrived the Sunday after Thanksgiving. My sister-in-law and her mother were there with my two nephews. My other half brought his twin brother, mother and grandmother. Groups of friends, I knew, were also in the audience, all of which did nothing but make my bowels churn even more violently as I reached for the Valium.

Allen outdid himself, making me look like a cross between a tranny hooker and Tammy Faye Bakker after the mortician was done with her. "If you don't take your makeup off after the show, you could work any corner in Chinatown," he said brightly.

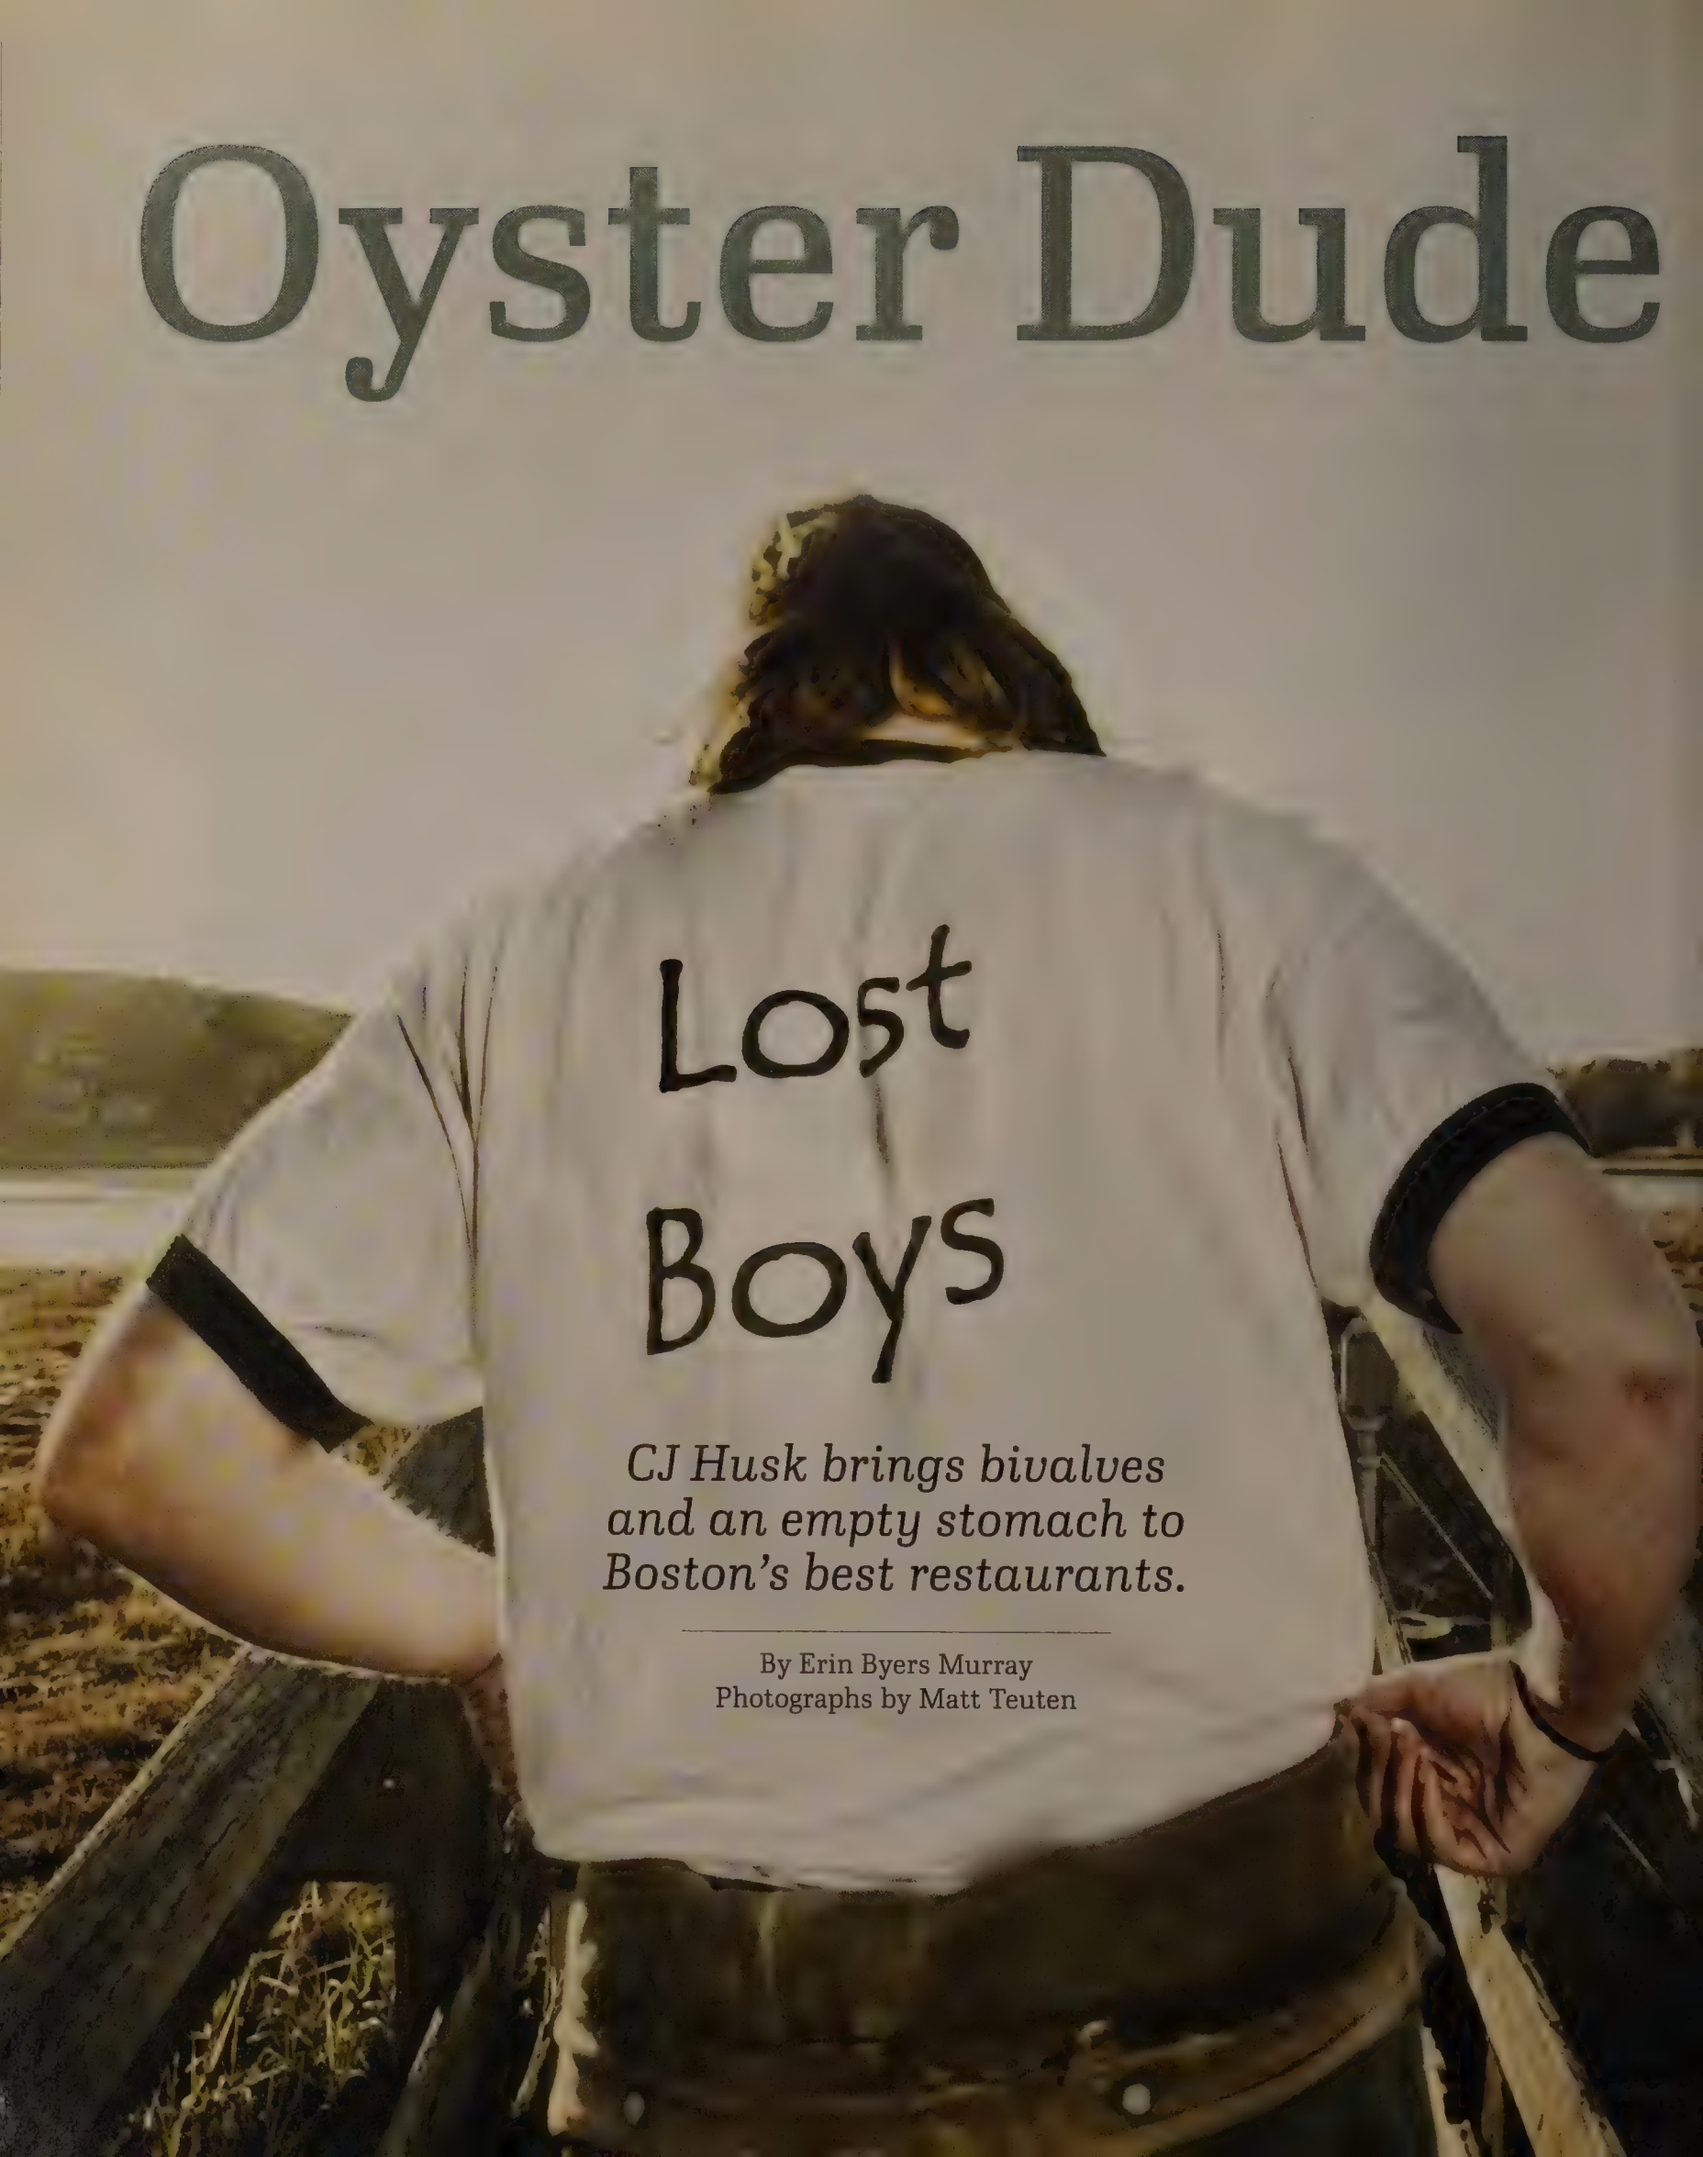
Then it was upstairs, onto the stilts, into the skirt and onto the stage. Surprisingly, I remember very little of the actual performance, quite possibly because I was trying not to look like Edvard Munch's "The Scream." It was over in a flash, and the rush of adrenaline I felt as they removed the skirt and my stilts backstage was almost as welcome as the gin gimlet I gulped down as soon as I got to a bar.

However, the most gratifying thing happened when my six-year-old nephew, Sam, looked up at me and said, "You were funny, Uncle Nonnie." It was the best praise I could hope for.

I reprised the role on the evening of Dec. 13, so that more of my friends could come laugh at me. Throughout it all, I'd estimate the number of variations I've heard on "break a leg" to be roughly equal to the number of times I've heard the ballet's overture on an elevator.

As for what I took from the whole thing: Despite all my sarcasm, it was, to be honest, a tremendously exhilarating and fun experience. An even bigger surprise, though, is that I can now say two things that are positively shocking: First, I never thought I could be more terrified of Mother Ginger than my niece. And second, I have to admit I kind of do love The Nutcracker. ✖✖✖

Oyster Dude



CJ Husk brings bivalves and an empty stomach to Boston's best restaurants.

By Erin Byers Murray
Photographs by Matt Teuten

MORNINGS AT ISLAND CREEK Oysters start with music. Today, British band Foghat rocks out; it's earsplitting for 8:45 am. The tunes match the energy at Duxbury's bustling farm. Mollusks are at their sweetest, meatiest this time of year, and the wholesale division distributes 200 to 300 yellow mesh bags to restaurants across the city and country daily. In the farm's garage, 28-year-old CJ Husk is boxing and tagging the bags with order slips. A lanky 6'3" with stringy hair and a shaggy goatee, Husk looks a little like a blond, bleary-eyed Jesus. In dirt-caked jeans and a trucker's cap.

He's the oyster dude. That's according to his business cards. More officially, he's Island Creek's delivery guy. He spends his days in a refrigerated white-and-green truck, zigzagging from Logan Airport to the Fish Pier to Natick, bringing oysters to Boston's top chefs. With his backdoor access comes a major perk: Everywhere Husk goes, someone feeds him. From take-out spring rolls to sit-down meals of buttered pasta and white wine, he eats his way through his route. His job is a foodie's dream.

The restaurant folks don't mind. To them, Husk is more than a delivery guy. He's tangible evidence of the current farm-to-table commitment. He's an icon, a modern-day merrymaker who could have walked off the set of Dazed and Confused. Because he plays his role with disarming sincerity and a dash of humor, says Rialto chef Jody Adams, "Everybody loves him." I spent three days driving and eating with Husk to see why.

Back at the farm, Husk's head grooves languidly to some techno-pop. With the truck packed, he wonders aloud about breakfast. It may seem like a trivial meal for a guy about to chow down in the city's best kitchens, but it weighs heavily. He settles on the "CJ special": a Styrofoam cup brimming with fried eggs, melted cheddar, tomato and cucumber slices, sauteed onions and chunks of hash browns. Breakfast in a cup. "They made it up for me so I could eat while I'm driving," he says picking up his order from Bennett's General Store next door. With one hand on the wheel, he digs in.

During the short ride to Logan, Husk talks about his training as a holistic therapist ("Not the froofy kind") and describes a girl he knows as "a total Scorpio." He's into Taoism and launches into a planetary discussion, but gets cut off as we arrive at the airport to unload a couple of boxes for a flight to San Francisco. From there, the oysters will be delivered to the French Laundry in Napa Valley, where renowned chef Thomas Keller might serve them alongside a smidge of caviar to deep-pocketed customers that same night.

After unloading his bigger orders to the colorful characters peppering the Fish Pier, Husk fights his way past traffic into the city's interior. Stepping through the back door at Kingfish Hall, he inhales the fragrant smoke from a wood-burning grill and runs downstairs to drop a bag in the walk-in. He pauses to scope out the competition. "Wellfleets," he says authoritatively, rubbing a grooved shell. Husk chats quickly with head chef Katherine See about her new baby and peers into a pot of bubbling soup. He's hoping for a bite of something but, sensing it's too early for a snack, takes off for his next stop, No. 9 Park.

With his backdoor access comes a major perk: Everywhere Husk goes, someone feeds him.

At the tony Beacon Hill eatery, he strides into the kitchen, which is eerily empty except for a ruddy-faced redhead he calls Pancake. The restaurant has a private party that night so the staff won't be in until later, Pancake tells us. Strike two. Husk moves on to Berkeley Street, where he's buzzed into a delivery entrance at Grill 23 & Bar—one of the farm's best customers. Walking a familiar path, he shouts "Hola" to a man portioning out slabs of sirloin before reaching the dessert department. "You're late! We just ate," pastry cook Kimberly Poulson teases. She hints at leftovers, sending Husk upstairs to the cavernous dining room where—score!—a platter of pulled-pork sandwiches and a bowl of pea-laden macaroni-and-cheese sits on a sideboard. He loads up a take-out container and makes his exit.

During the long ride out to Skipjack's in Natick, Husk explains how he hooked up with Island Creek about five years ago. Like most of his life stories, this one starts with a girl (or, in this case, several). After a brief stint at Northeastern—where he rowed on the crew team but didn't graduate—Husk had a few part-time jobs, including coaching for the Duxbury Bay Maritime School. Out on the water, he had ample opportunity to flirt with the college women moonlighting at the oyster farm. After a few days of hanging around, owner Skip Bennett asked if he wanted to help out. "He kept showing up and working every day, so finally I said, 'I guess I'd better start paying him,'" recalls Bennett, who founded Island Creek in 1992, growing the business from a few oystermen to a staff of about 50 during peak harvest season in the summer.

When the time came to hire a dedicated delivery guy, Husk volunteered. On one of his first drops, the chef gave him a crab cake for the road. Free food and a flexible schedule? Husk was sold. Along with the knowledge he'd culled on the farm, his likable personality quickly made him a regular on the restaurant circuit. Soon, he was palling around with chefs, discussing menus and sharing treats like the wild periwinkles he gathers off the rocks behind his home.

Behind the casual demeanor, however, there's a true salesman

at work, which Husk reveals during an impromptu stop at a new restaurant. At a quick meeting with the sous chef in the first-floor oyster bar, he runs down the inventory. "Blue Points are good, and I like the Wiannos, but you've got some problems with that batch," he says, pointing out a particularly gnarled shell. "Yeah, that one's definitely diseased. Have to watch out for those." This gets the sous chef's attention; he immediately picks up the shell and chucks it out before asking Husk to come back with samples next week. As we leave, Husk clues me in. "You can't shove it down their throats. Ours is a better product, but I'm not just going to come out and say it," he explains. "I'll bring him some oysters next week so he can see for himself."

"Being able to go into these kitchens and watch everyone prep these eleaborate meals is pretty incredible."

Harvesting year-round means that Husk and the rest of the staff never get a real break. If they did, he'd probably spend his time surfing, a sport he's all but given up. Not that you'll hear him complain. Sure, free food is a perk, but that's not the best part. "Being able to go into these kitchens and watch everyone prep these elaborate meals is pretty incredible," he says. Although Husk grew up on a New Hampshire farm, he only had a grass-roots relationship with food. "We'd never eat out at nice restaurants." Now, he has tried them all in one form or another. Yet, he still lives a relatively simple life in his family's summer home on the water (he rents an apartment for the winter). "The coolest part is standing in the fields in the morning and then crossing over and bringing that world, that piece of the farm, into the kitchen community every day."

As we return to Boston, Husk decides he needs a nap. He pulls into a little park in Brookline where he turns off the truck and takes a quick snooze. "It's a safety precaution," he assures me. A phone call from headquarters jolts him awake, and we make our way to Kenmore Square. Outside Great Bay, he spots another well-known purveyor, Ben the mushroom guy, whose single, gray braid hangs down his back. Husk bounds over to him, clearly amped to see the mycologist. "Whatcha got today, Ben?" The man answers by shoving a box of earthy specimens toward him. "Best-looking shitakes you'll ever see," he says with a gap-toothed grin.

Inside, the gang greets Husk with platters of onion rings and nachos smothered in melted cheese, pork and pickled jalapeños. He picks at the chips while standing alongside then-chef Adam Fuller. Husk spouts off stories about a recent staff meal he ate at Thomas Keller's restaurant Per Se in New York, causing Fuller to raise his eyebrows at the image of the oyster dude inside such a high-class joint. "CJ, you're the only guy in the world who could get away with it," he says with a laugh.

The sun is fading by the time we reach L'Espalier. As Husk breezes past the kitchen crew, the crowded room hums with chatter. He disappears into the walk-in and does his drop. He doesn't make it two steps out the doorway before four cooks bum-rush him, tackling him to the floor. Husk springs free, and the guys retreat in a fit of laughter. He pulls up his hoodie; instead of signing the invoice, the chefs have scrawled a signature onto his waist with a Sharpie. Next door, Sel de la Terre chef Louis DiBicarri gives Husk a bemused nod and points him toward the back of the dining room. Past a drawn curtain, a few managers are sitting down to red beans and rice. He joins them for one last meal.

Day two on the road, and Husk settles on chili for breakfast. First restaurant stop? Persephone in Fort Point Channel and his second breakfast. Pastry chef Katie Kimball brings out a small bucket of cinnamon, apple and bacon pancake-batter; in minutes, she scrapes a stack onto his plate as restaurant co-owner Michael Krupp wanders in.

"Hey, CJ! Pancakes, huh?"

Mouth full, Husk mumbles, "Hey Michael, want some?"

"Nah," Krupp laughs. "I bet you can't eat that whole stack in one bite."

"The coolest part is standing in the fields in the morning and then bringing that world into the kitchen."

"No?" he counters. "You want me to? I can do it, Michael."

With that, he shoves the remaining mound between his lips, swallowing almost all of it down. The staff is in hysterics, howling as he wipes syrup off his beard. Krupp pats him on the back. "Nice work, CJ. Very nice work."

Today, work also means stops in the North End, Back Bay and, eventually, Cambridge. On the road, he ranks each neighborhood according to the attractiveness of its women. The North End and Harvard Square get highest marks; his head swivels to catch every long head of hair or tall pair of boots that goes by. He's decidedly single.

By three o'clock, both breakfasts have worn off. Just in time, Husk arrives at the back door of Harvest where chef Mary Dumont is ready. "Hungry, CJ?" she asks before leading the way to the dining room. There are two trays of moussaka, as well as a citrusy cucumber salad and melting-hot chocolate-chip cookies.

Treats in hand, he hops a few blocks over to Rialto. "What are we having tonight?" he asks sous chef Nuno Alves. Minutes later, he's seated at a banquette, sipping a glass of white wine and chatting with Adams about her dining-room playlist. Diners begin trickling in. "Guess that means it's time to get to work," she says before sending Husk off with a motherly hug.

Across the Charles River in the South End, he makes a final stop at 28 Degrees, where dinner service is in full swing. Unfazed, Husk hops behind the line for a quick oyster-shucking contest with one of the cooks (he lets the other guy win) before walking out with a container of spring rolls tucked under his arm.

On my last day with Husk, he returns to Grill 23. There, he finds chef Jay Murray relaxing in the light-filled dining room. Husk lingers over a portobello-and-onion–topped burger. "Nice meal by the windows, white tablecloths," he notes, packing up. "What could be better?"

Fridays are a marathon, so he pushes through the next stops quickly. At Persephone, sous chef Dante Cantalupo sends him off with a house-made agua fresca, and then it's on to No. 9 Park, where Husk unloads some of his periwinkles, which he harvested the previous night. When he's told that the staff meal starts in 20 minutes, Husk is faced with the hardest decision I've seen him tackle: Wait or beat traffic to get out to Brookline?

"It's such a tough call," he says, biting his lower lip. "I've actually never eaten a staff meal here." He considers both options, eventually deciding it's time to go. "There'll be another meal down the road," he says confidently. "I'm sure of it."

He's rewarded 20 minutes later at Beacon Street Tavern with another hamburger and a pile of crispy French fries. Next, he swings by Sasso, pausing to wolf down a grilled hot dog smothered in spicy ketchup. A quick stop at Brasserie Jo yields him a few nibbles of foie gras, and before we know it, he's making his last stop at Union Bar and Grille. Inside, dinner has already started, so he quickly gets his invoice signed.

Not two steps outside the door, his cell phone rings. It's Jared Chianciola, the chef from 28 Degrees. They need 200 bivalves, pronto. Is there any chance Husk has some left on the truck? "Alright, Jared," he replies, looking at the time. "I can be there in five minutes." With a sigh, he pockets his phone and turns toward the truck. "Maybe we can sit at the bar for a bite," he says, grinning with restored enthusiasm. The oyster dude's day is never done. ✖✖✖

Australia ★ ½ Less of an assault than his headache-inducing Moulin Rouge, director Baz Luhrmann's latest postmodern pastiche attempts to revive the sprawling, Technicolor travelogues of the early CinemaScope era. Nicole Kidman stars as an uppity Englishwoman who finds her fortune as an unlikely cattle baron in the rugged outback, thanks to Hugh Jackman's self-consciously macho, anachronistically progressive cowboy. Like most Luhrmann films, Australia is an index of iconic shots and sequences from other, better movies. There's something almost charming about the deliberately dated soundstage shooting and retro special effects, but the filmmaker's adoration of MGM artifice doesn't blend with a subplot concerning his homeland's attempted genocide of the Aborigines. It also feels like the longest movie ever made, with major characters fed to crocodiles during expository montages so that the story can keep rebooting every time you think they'll all live happily ever after. Crikey. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Burn After Reading ★★★ ½ Don't be fooled by the vibrant colors of Emmanuel Lubezki's cinematography or the giant cartoon performances of the cast, because Joel and Ethan Coen's follow-up to their masterful No Country for Old Men is every bit as bleak as its Oscar-lauded predecessor. It's just a heck of a lot funnier. For reasons too convoluted to explain here, Brad Pitt's exuberant himbo gym instructor tries blackmailing John Malkovich's boozy CIA burnout, with more than a few unforeseen complications arriving via George Clooney's sleazy lothario and Tilda Swinton as the world's meanest pediatrician. Shot, cut and scored with the ominous overtones of a paranoid thriller yet performed as broad farce for maximum dissonance, the Coens send all this silliness spiraling into bloodshed with clockwork precision. Like most of the movies from these gifted, dyspeptic brothers, Burn is secretly about the tragic smallness of people and the fatality of self-absorption. Every character is doomed by assuming they're more important to the plot than they actually are. (In the suburbs.)

Changeling ★★ Clint Eastwood's latest directorial effort is a nasty little number. It's grueling and unpleasant in the manner of all late-period Eastwood, but it's missing the crucial moral uncertainty that marks his masterpieces. Angelina Jolie stars in this true story of a flapper-era single mom whose son is kidnapped and murdered. Five months later, the famously corrupt LAPD returns a boy who bears a slight resemblance, then banishes her to a mental hospital when she dares declare that this shorter little weirdo isn't actually her child. The outrageous injustice of it all doesn't escape Eastwood for a second. He's righteously angry, shooting Jolie in angelic silent-movie tableaux and casting the L.A. cops as sniveling, wormy toads. Jeffrey Donovan, the cut-rate Guy Pearce look-alike playing Jolie's grand inquisitor, lacks only a mustache to twirl. Every slightly interesting angle in this perplexing, James Ellroy–friendly tale of police corruption has been flattened out and oversimplified to the point of preposterousness. (At Boston Common and in the suburbs.)

A Christmas Tale ★★★★ Writer/director Arnaud Desplechin's dizzying take on the tired yuletide saga about a dysfunctional family is so joyously overstuffed, watching it is like speed-reading a massive Russian novel. Catherine Deneuve stars as the aloof, ailing matriarch of this screwed-up clan. She needs a bone marrow transplant, but which of her damaged, embittered offspring will provide a genetic match? With energy and good humor, Desplechin heroically pursues her family's secrets, grudges and hidden resentments. No scene plays out predictably, as the revelations and recriminations ricochet off one another to a jaunty soundtrack. In its own peculiar fashion, this twisted tale proves strangely inspiring, as it dodges pat resolutions with a rueful smile. (At Kendall Square.)

The Curious Case of Benjamin Button ★★ David Fincher, the gifted and sardonic director of Fight Club and Zodiac, goes Forrest Gump in this shockingly syrupy take on an old F. Scott Fitzgerald short story. Borrowing the premise and little else from the original work, Button stars Brad Pitt as a quizzical fellow born as a elderly man who ages backwards as the film grinds on. And on. Some gorgeous, state-of-the-art digital effects have been invented to place Pitt's face on all sorts of incongruous bodies, but besides existing as a technical marvel, there's little point to the proceedings. Screenwriter Eric Roth seems to have recycled his Forrest Gump script, changing a few names but keeping the central notion of a bumpkin in

The Wrestler
Starring Mickey Rourke, Marisa Tomei, Evan Rachel Wood, Mark Margolis and Judah Friedlander. Written by Robert Siegel. Directed by Darren Aronofsky. At Boston Common.

THE CAMERA SNEAKS UP ON him slowly. It's the kind of shot that's become an art-film cliché—a long, steady take behind someone as he or she trudges through a banal day. Many filmmakers seem to think a shot like this is key to grounding us in a character's world, but in his extraordinary new film The Wrestler, director Darren Aronofsky uses it for a more insidious purpose. He allows only tiny, fleeting glimpses of his broken-down protagonist and builds the suspense to a shocking close-up worthy of a horror movie. When we finally get a full-on shot of Randy "The Ram" Robinson, the entire audience shrieks as one.

"My God, Mickey Rourke looks terrible!"

He was beautiful, once. Back in the early '80s, Rourke had all the makings of a gutter-rat James Dean. Take another look at Diner or The Pope of Greenwich Village, and you'll find a brooding macho man who paradoxically displayed an almost feminine vulnerability. Rourke had a sneaky, singular film presence, but bad decisions and awful movies have resulted in him being an all-purpose punch line for decades. There were plenty of stupid sex flicks, countless tabloid melodramas and, most disastrously, an ill-advised foray into professional boxing that only succeeded in pummeling that handsome, expressive mug into rubble. Rourke now looks like a cautionary ad against cheap plastic surgery, his face permanently mashed, stretched and altogether destroyed.

But this kind of comeback has been brewing for a while. Our movies have been poorer without Rourke's idiosyncratic line readings and flourishes, but the question remains: Where do you put him? Fleeting cameos in the efforts of old pals—Francis Ford Coppola's The Rainmaker, Sean Penn's The Pledge and Bob Dylan's Masked and Anonymous—showed he's still got what it takes. It wasn't until Robert Rodriguez's Sin City that Rourke finally found another leading role worthy of his formidable presence, and even that one arrived with a bitterly ironic catch. It was a film full of hyperstylized, disfigured grotesques, so Rourke blended in just fine.

The Wrestler is shrewd enough to use his decimated visage to its advantage. Hell, the movie is practically a monument to his personal ruin. Randy "The Ram" Robinson is a washed-up, teetering wreck of a man who doesn't stand a chance of recapturing his former glory. Every close-up hammers that point home. The film would've lost its poignancy had its original star, Nicolas Cage, stayed on in the role. (Presumably, Cage was aghast to discover that he'd appear in a film that isn't terrible, and thus promptly split.)

Niko Tavernise

Robinson unloads trucks at a supermarket all week, then spends his weekends in tights at fluorescent-lit American Legion halls, reliving the good old days and plotting suplexes with equally wobbly former legends. The screenplay, by former Onion editor Robert Siegel, isn't exactly heavy on plot. It's steeped in behavior and thrives in a declining, Jersey-swamp milieu so evocatively rendered that you'll feel the crappy weather in your bones.

The Wrestler doesn't offer much in the way of easy answers or pat solutions. It simply asks that we spend a little time with these people.

Faced with a serious health crisis, Robinson reaches out to a like-minded stripper (well-played by Marisa Tomei) who finds herself in similar circumstances—growing a bit too old and undesirable for her chosen profession. He also briefly attempts to reconnect with his estranged daughter (Evan Rachel Wood), but all the damage he recklessly inflicted in the past can't be easily undone. The Wrestler doesn't offer much in the way of easy answers or pat solutions. It simply asks that we spend a little time with these people and experience their world for a spell.

Coming from a director like Aronofsky, this is nothing short of revelatory. A swaggering young showboat who previously specialized in either pulverizing his audience (the frenetic Requiem for a Dream) or boring them to tears with pseudo-religious nonsense (his altogether regrettable The Fountain), Aronofsky has never before demonstrated the slightest interest in the patience and humanity that flows throughout The Wrestler.

Rourke is key, giving his all and then some to this juiced-up, hulking mass of regret. The Ram might be a perpetual screwup who won't let his glory days go, but somehow the actor finds very funny, unexpectedly tender moments between the lines. Sure Robinson fails constantly, but only in that warm, old-school Rourke fashion that offers up the frailty of his character and dares you to love him for all his myriad shortcomings. This is breathtaking work.

Here is the long-awaited, true sequel to the original Rocky, suffused with quiet desperation, squalid backdrops and earthy humor. Add to that a final scene that's bound to break your heart even before the devastating Bruce Springsteen theme song kicks in, and yes, The Wrestler is a great film. ✖✖✖ a doomed romance naively wandering through blunt historical signposts with a surfeit of cornpone aphorisms. There's no actual conflict as we wait for Pitt to grow young and die, just a lot of pretty pictures, plus the visceral nagging disappointment that a talent as subversive as Fincher's stooped to helming shiny Hollywood sap. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Doubt ★★★ Sometimes subtlety is overrated. Just ask Meryl Streep, who smacks her lips and carves ham as the ferocious Sister Aloysius in John Patrick Shanley's big-screen adaptation of his Pulitzer Prize–winning play. In a Bronx Catholic School circa 1964, Streep's nasty, uptight nun stares daggers at Philip Seymour Hoffman's progressive, freewheeling Father Flynn. But when Flynn's potentially inappropriate relationship with the school's first black student is called into question, we're in for some grand Inside the Actor's Studio explosions. Shanley's meaty moral questionnaire explores the gulf between tradition and modernity in the heightened form of a parable, with Amy Adams' meek Sister James torn between our protagonists. Shanley hasn't directed since 1990's tragically underrated Joe Versus the Volcano, and while his visuals are fairly perfunctory, he's at least wise enough to embrace his own material's inherent staginess, highlighting the broad theatricality of these performances. You'll never forget you're watching a filmed play, but with a cast like this, who can complain? (At Boston Common, Kendall Square and West Newton.)

Four Christmases ★★ Vince Vaughn makes a magnificent thin-skinned jerk, rolling his eyes and nattering over some perceived slight. The only catch is that he's no good at sincerity, which is a big problem now that he's starring in his second sappy holiday flick in as many years. (The less said about Fred Claus, the better.) Four Christmases stars Vaughn and Reese Witherspoon as callow yuppies attempting to avoid an uncomfortable quartet of family dinners. These are two selfish, uncaring people, but the movie lacks the nerve to follow through on their monstrousness, instead pleading for our sympathy and presenting their families as cartoonish, bullying grotesques. There's one nicely played sequence involving Sissy Spacek as Vaughn's horny, hippie mom and a game of Taboo, but the rest of these meals are sub-Fockers slapstick. Director Seth Gordon helmed last year's phenomenal documentary The King of Kong, but his feature debut fails to sustain a consistent tone. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Frost/Nixon ★★ ½ In refashioning Peter Morgan's smash 2006 play for the big screen, director Ron Howard made a wise move casting original stars Michael Sheen and Frank Langella. This picture has a ton of problems, but at the very least, Sheen's sly performance as seemingly callow chat-show host David Frost and Langella's towering Tricky Dick have been preserved on film for posterity. Morgan's play positioned Frost's 1977 televised interviews with Nixon as a David and Goliath battle, a belated national catharsis in which the wily interrogator tripped the disgraced former president into something close to a mea culpa. Where Howard errs is exactly where this terminally dull filmmaker always errs: He treats his audience like imbeciles. We've got all the makings of a brilliant psychodrama playing out in the loaded glares and strategic statements of Sheen and Langella, yet Howard constantly cuts away to a fake documentary format with a peanut gallery of bit players staring straight into the lens and helpfully explaining everything we've just seen. Thanks, Opie. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Milk ★★★ ½ Playing the title role in Gus Van Sant's rousing, surprisingly accessible biography of slain civil-rights leader Harvey Milk, Sean Penn does something we haven't seen him do in years: He smiles. Oscar-season biopics often feel like homework, but Van Sant charts Milk's rise to prominence as the first openly gay man elected to public office as a freewheeling, high-spirited romp. The filmmaker's exuberance matches that of his lead, who clearly hasn't had this much fun since Fast Times at Ridgemont High. Eight years ago, this gifted director turned his back on Hollywood, devoting himself to abstract, lyrical films like Gerry, Last Days, and his recent Paranoid Park. In such difficult company, Milk feels startlingly conventional. It's crowd-pleasing and broadly entertaining, yet crafted with savvy visual intelligence by Van Sant and his longtime cinematographer Harris Savides. Like the inclusive American ideals Milk so boisterously advocated, the movie is open to everybody. (At Kendall Square, Coolidge Corner and Waltham Embassy.)

Quantum of Solace ★★★ If you look at Casino Royale as the James Bond franchise's Batman Begins, this nasty piece of business counts as the series' The Dark Knight, as it sends a dour and vengeful 007 into a chaotic world gone wrong. Daniel Craig once again compellingly plays the legendary secret agent as a perpetual motion machine, brusque and cruel in the manner of Ian Fleming's original novels. The film takes a while to get rolling, as it's front-loaded with too many inconsequential chase sequences that are often poorly staged by director Marc Forster. But Quantum improves considerably once folks are allowed to settle down and start speaking to one another. Paul Haggis' screenplay snarkily reconfigures the past movies' shadowy cabal Spectre as a new millennium group of cutthroat capitalists bleeding the world's natural resources dry. It's lean and mean to a fault; a bit more breathing room for the supporting cast might have helped matters. Still, the sheer viciousness of the film and bleakness of its worldview are bracing. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Rachel Getting Married ★★★★ Jonathan Demme's extraordinary new film transforms a weekend wedding party into a tapestry of jumbled humanity. Taking a cue from the late Robert Altman, Demme packs his frames with overlapping chatter and cockeyed conviviality. Cutting through the clatter is Anne Hathaway's revelatory performance as Kym, the bad-seed sister fresh out of rehab who hijacks the festivities with one narcissistic faux pas after another. The screenplay, by first-timer Jenny Lumet (daughter of legendary director Sidney), has a few tricks up its sleeve, including an old family tragedy from which Mom (Debra Winger) and Dad (Bill Irwin) may never fully recover. What's most miraculous about Rachel is how expertly Demme navigates Lumet's hairpin tonal shifts. The film swings from hilarious to crushing and back again, sometimes within the space of a single scene. There's so much joy in this movie—so much music and happiness spilling outside the frame—but also stark, unflinching pain. (At Waltham Embassy and in the suburbs)

Slumdog Millionaire ★★★½ This blast of filmmaking exuberance from Trainspotting director Danny Boyle offers the year's catchiest gimmick. Jamal (Dev Patel) is an uneducated orphan from the slums who finds himself an unlikely contestant on India's version of Who Wants to Be a Millionaire. As luck would have it, every question serendipitously unlocks another flashback chapter in his wild, picaresque biography. With such a structure, The Full Monty writer Simon Beaufoy's screenplay can't help but err on the schematic side. But it's a thrilling experience nonetheless, thanks to Boyle's verve and commitment to sensory overload. Jamal's saga is Dickens by way of Bollywood with a touch of fairy tale magic. As the valiant young hero rockets from one dangerous scrape to another, even the ghastliest images of poverty are emboldened and energized with vibrant Technicolor hues. Will Jamal rescue his childhood sweetheart from the Fagin-like local crime lord? Can he win the 20-million-rupee jackpot? As the answers unfold, cinematographer Antony Dod Mantle cranks up the colors while Boyle blasts the bouncy music cues, all to thrilling effect. (At Boston Common, Coolidge Corner and Kendall Square.)

Synecdoche, New York ★★ In his startlingly original screenplays for Being John Malkovich, Adaptation and Eternal Sunshine of the Spotless Mind, Charlie Kaufman merged depressive angst with absurdist whimsy to create his own genre: heartsick slapstick. His directorial debut, a grammar-nerd goof on my mom's hometown of Schenectady, is similarly ambitious but lacks any levity or momentum. The film is obsessed with the ways art cannibalizes life, the deterioration of the human body and finally the grim inevitability of death. Philip Seymour Hoffman stars as a sickly theater director attempting to make sense of his life by staging it as an ever-evolving theater experience, until he becomes so consumed with recasting and rewriting that he loses all trace of himself. It's a nifty metaphor, one perhaps more suited for a novel, but as a feature, Synecdoche is an unbearable grind that's relentlessly one-note, dingy and oppressive as you wait for everybody to die of old age. The movie is thrilling to discuss afterward, but torture to actually sit through. (At Kendall Square and Waltham Embassy.)

Twilight ★ Stephenie Meyer's tween novels reach their insidious cinematic potential in the hands of Catherine Hardwicke, who trivialized adolescent drug use with her insipid Thirteen before shrinking the Virgin Mary's life story into a Dude, Where's My Manger epic in her justly forgotten Nativity Story. Twilight teaches young girls that a hunky, handsome vampire (Robert Pattinson) will always love you for your clumsy, banal self, no matter how dull you are. The film is a deeply unsettling glimpse into modern American psychosis, equating desire with death and boasting enlightened concepts like, "We can't go all the way, because then you'll turn into a monster." So amateurishly assembled that the villains don't even arrive until the 90-minute mark, this is Hardwicke's most incompetent movie yet, about as lame as you'd expect from a 53-year-old lady lecturing "these kids, today." (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

W. ★★★ Hardly the comic hit-piece Dems were hoping for, Oliver Stone's curiously compassionate take on Bush turns out to be one of the legendary muckraker's most restrained pictures. Hewing largely to the historical record, Stanley Weiser's succinct screenplay runs on double tracks, alternating snatches of Dubya's wasted youth and born-again reformation with scenes from our long walk to war in Iraq. In the title role, Josh Brolin exhibits an uncanny mastery of the sputtering grammatical train wrecks and apish arm gestures that have made their mark these past eight years. It's bizarrely entertaining to watch Stone's blunt force dramatizations of those sinister cabinet meetings,

Ralph Nelson

Careless Whispers
Don't Nix It

with special scorn heaped on Toby Jones' Karl Rove and Richard Dreyfuss' subtly menacing Dick Cheney. As in his audacious 1995 biopic, Nixon, Stone can't help but muster sympathy for the devil. W. is the tragedy of a deeply shallow, arrogant man, who works out his daddy issues on an international stage. (In the suburbs.)

Zack and Miri Make a Porno ★★★ Kevin Smith's first decent film in a decade conspicuously borrows current comedy hero Judd Apatow's stock company of actors. This makes a strange sort of sense, as the man-children and scatological sweetness of Apatow's The 40-Year-Old Virgin and Superbad owe enormous debts to Smith's do-it-yourself debut, Clerks. It's also just refreshing to see trained professionals handle Smith's unwieldy, overwritten dialogue as opposed to his high-school buddies or Ben Affleck. The hilarious Seth Rogen and a luminous Elizabeth Banks star as broke best friends attempting to make a stag movie for quick cash and discovering unexpected feelings once it comes time to perform. Sunny and optimistic even when wallowing in potty-mouthed filth (real-life porn stars Traci Lords and Katie Morgan play pivotal roles), the film is an unexpectedly heartfelt salute to the creative process. Zack and Miri fosters fond feelings for this makeshift family of slackers, who grow and prosper by focusing their energy into a productive endeavor, even if it's one that involves anal sex. (At Boston Common and in the suburbs.)

Red Ridin'

Oh, Fudge If you love holiday comedies, the Brattle Theater has you covered with A Christmas Story Dec. 19–21. Bob Clark directs this holiday classic packed with enough life lessons to fill Santa's sleigh, including the dangers of licking a freezing metal pole and how to pronounce foreign words like "fragile." The fun doesn't stop until all the presents are unwrapped; so place your Chinese food order, break out your bunny costume and fire off your Red Ryder BB gun—just be careful not to shoot your eye out.

GREATEST HITS

Our critic shares his list of the choicest CDs and concert DVDs for the holiday season.

Fleet Foxes These evocative Seattle folk-rockers forge ethereal, multipart harmonies that nod to madrigals and early CSNY, a stark contrast to most of today's pop fare.

Portishead Third The trip-hop revival slipped away—by choice for spectral singer Beth Gibbons and her wingmen in this British trio, which scales back the beats and tightens the tension with bleak, oblique soundtracks for lost souls.

Nick Cave & the Bad Seeds Dig!!! Lazarus, Dig!!! One of rock's most consistently brilliant songsmiths expounds on sex, death and religion with graphic glee while his Bad Seeds sow garage-blues mood and mayhem.

Vampire Weekend Overhyped but naively charming, the debut from Brooklyn's preppy indie-rockers draws on its Afro-pop and post-punk influences with sparse, sunny playfulness.

Lionel Loueke Karibu A subtly stunning new voice of jazz guitar, this Berklee graduate weaves deft finger-picking, airy scat-singing and syncopations from his native Africa into his trio's odd-meter interplay. Mentors Herbie Hancock and Wayne Shorter lend cameos.

Portugal. The Man Censored Colors The link between Sarah Palin and the oddly named band's hometown, Wasilla, will fade. But this CD will endure. A kaleidoscopic watershed for the group, it mashes rock, soul and even dub reggae into a virtual Abbey Road homage.

Erykah Badu New Amerykah, Part One (4th World War) Serving as both spark and salve for the spirit in these mad times, this R&B songstress' ambitious return casts a unified vibe in hypnotic tone poems, blaxploitation funk, spoken-word exhortation and hip-hop edge. It's a cry for hope carried by her expressive, honeyed and distinctive voice.

Stephen Malkmus & the Jicks Real Emotional Trash The onetime Pavement frontman kicks out the jams, wrapping his wry wordplay in wigged-out guitar excursions, stoked by ex—Sleater Kinney drummer Janet Weiss.

The Black Keys Attack & Release Producer Brian Burton (Danger Mouse) gives textural breadth to Akron's minimalist blues-rockers without losing the duo's gritty fundamentals, honing ghostly harmonies and keyboards largely manned by guitarist Dan Auerbach. Burton also produced 2008 CDs for Beck and his own Gnarls Barkley, but this one's the gem.

The Raconteurs Consolers of the Lonely Jack White's alternate band bursts at the seams, saluting the 1970s with twin-guitar crunch, country roots and piano balladry that nods to Led Zeppelin, Badfinger, Paul McCartney and the Who, to name a few. Released on a week's notice and sounding that spontaneous, it turns the derivative into the dynamic.

CONCERT DVDS

The Rolling Stones Shine a Light What could warrant yet another live DVD of the (older) Stones? Mick Jagger rises to the occasion with an illuminating shoot by Martin Scorsese in New York's Beacon Theatre. Rare nuggets and charismatic cameos by Buddy Guy, Jack White and Christina Aguilera also boost the show.

Muse HAARP Headlining two nights at England's Wembley Stadium is a statement in itself. But while Foo Fighters shares that rush on DVD, boosted by Jimmy Page and John Paul Jones on a Zeppelin encore, Muse drops the superior release. Cameras zoom and pan in quick cuts, unique angles, and washed-out or tinted tones. Yet rather than distract, it all translates the excitement of the trio's prog-glam bombast before an adoring homeland crowd.

Zappa Plays Zappa Even without Frank, who died in 1993, this well-schooled gang of young bucks and Zappa veterans led by son Dweezil dazzles onstage. It's impeccably filmed to match the precision in Zappa's complex compositions.

The Police Certifiable While these guys seemed out of synch with each other by this year's Tweeter Center stop, they play with keen focus and kinetic chemistry in Buenos Aires for this documentary of their big-ticket reunion.

Phish Walnut Creek Yes, Phish is reuniting in 2009, and fans can only hope the jam-band kings can shake off five years apart and flow like they do in this 1997 show. The simple camera work lingers on the musicians in overlapping flight. ✖✖✖

From Europe With Love

Homegrown Caspian has been busy. In October, the Beverly-based band completed its European tour, keeping a blog of their impressions of the Prague skyline, beer gardens and other attractions. The group also headlined the decidedly American South by Southwest festival in March and managed to play a series of concerts in local venues throughout 2008. Back home now for another New England winter, the post-rockers are focused on recording their next full-length album, which will follow their 2007 debut, The Four Trees. Catch Caspian on its only break from the studio at the Middle East on Dec. 30.

Books & Poetry

Bloc Party

Fleeing Red Turns out you can go home again. All it takes is a few decades, painful heartbreak and the historic fall of the Iron Curtain. In Robert Wexelblatt's novel Zublinka Among Women, an aging writer/philosopher returns to his native country years after being forced to flee for taking false credit for a controversial pamphlet. On his trip, he reconnects with lost loves and uncovers earth-shattering truths. The author and BU professor presents his work Jan. 6 at Brookline Booksmith. Veronica Barila

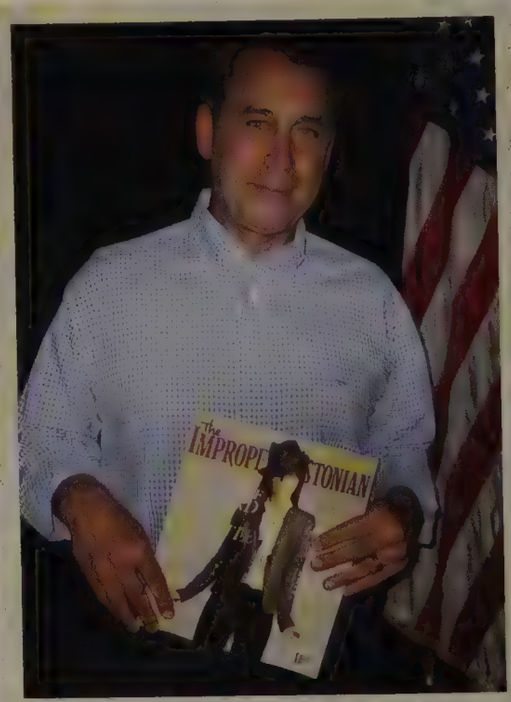
ATTENTION BOUNTY HUNTERS! BONUS POINTS TO ANYONE WHO CAN CAPTURE AN IMPROPER READER GOING CRAZY AT THE DANCE OF THE MAD ONES, HELD DEC. 28 IN FUENTE CARRETEROS SPAIN.

Unlike the rest of your friends, we want to see the photos from your next trip. Where did you take us? Send us a picture of you or a buddy or, better yet, someone famous reading THE IMPROPER BOSTONIAN and tell us where you were. The wilder your destination and the more creative your photo, the better your chances of making the cut in the esteemed IMPROPER Sightings.

Hagop Minassian, his daughter Suzanne, Zovig Tashjian and her husband, Deran, pose in front of the Marriott in Yerevan, Armenia. Next stop: 7-Eleven for some Slurpians™.

Alana Wright and Jill Hanson brought us to South Dakota's Badlands National Park, which preserves acres of sharply eroded buttes. As opposed to Madonna, who just preserves one.

While in town for a conference, Alexandra Krol, Stephanie Sweeney and Ryan Hinchey stopped by the shores of Monaco—also known as Business-Casual Beach.



Ohio Congressman John Boehner is the U.S. House Minority Leader. He's also a man who appreciates the power of baby blue.

Final Answer...

Despite the glaring absence of Bob Barker and Monty Hall, the Steppingstone Foundation's Game Show Gala was a corker of an evening, complete with garish sets, shapely spokesmodels and fabulous prizes.

Held at the Charles Hotel, it attracted such sparkly individuals as Lori and Matthew Sidman, Dick and Nancy Friedman, Sarah and Peter Monaco, Brent Shay, Scott Knox and Andy McLean, who wrote the foundation a check for a cool million bucks.

The evening's highlight, however, was watching former Rhodes scholar John Simon get his butt kicked by three Steppingstone students in a pop quiz. They could have called it Who Wants to Be a Stupid Millionaire?

Does He Do Bar Mitzvahs?

Forget San Francisco. I left my heart in the ballroom at the Mandarin Oriental.

It's hard to imagine a glitzier evening than the fundraiser held there for the Boston Public Library's Homework Assistance Program, which featured an intimate concert by legendary crooner Tony Bennett.

Not surprisingly, it attracted a high-octane crowd that included über-developers Steve Weiner and Robin Brown with their stunning spouses, Roberta and Marcia, jazz legend Fred Taylor, supermarket scions Deb Goldberg and Fotene Demoulas, presidential pals Carol and Bernie Fulp, perennial hipster Darryl Settles, cardiologist-to-the-stars Larry Cohn and the lovely Roberta, catering mogul Holly Safford and so on.

Dinner was delicious. The wine was excellent. The concert was unforgettable. The library made tons of dough. And Bennett summed the whole thing up nicely by singing, "Who could ask for anything more?"

How Much Is That Monet in the Window?

Anyone these days with two nickels left to rub together could have decorated their castle nicely with the pieces on display at the 12th annual Boston International Fine Art Show, held at the Cyclorama.

The Gala Preview, which raised beaucoup dinero for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, attracted the likes of velvet-throated broadcasting behemoth Ron della Chiesa, ruby-throated opera diva and North Shore grande dame Winnie Gray, portraitist to the rich and famous Cheryl Richards, secret agent Joan Jolley, the hottie hat trick of Tim Leahy, Brett Miguel and Rob Caro, one woman who (planning ahead) declared, "I decided I'm giving up garbage for Lent," and another who, when asked if she was buying anything, said, "Are you kidding? It's time to hunker down and eat noodles."

Yes, or M&Ms...

It's the black-tie event that officially jumpstarts the holiday season: the Children's Hospital League Gala, held at the Intercontinental.

The diamonds were dragged out of the vault, the furs came out of the closet, and the big-hearted and sizably walleted descended on the waterfront. Among them were cochairs Sarah Bishins and Lauri Sugar, real estate mack daddy Steve Karp and the lovely Jill, lovable eccentrics Lynne and Gary Smith, notable Newtonians Steve and Lynne Karol, blonde sex bomb Lisa Hughes of WBZ-TV Channel 4 and her other half, accomplished lensman Mike Casey, either two Happy Rudnicks or there was a typo in the program, a woman who said during the live auction, "Taking a helicopter to a NASCAR race? That's my idea of hell times two," and another who wisely pointed out, "No woman worth her salt wears comfortable shoes."

However, the funniest remark concerning fashion came from a Boston Children's Chorus member as the singers waited outside the ballroom to perform. When a guest commented on their cute primary-colored T-shirts, the girl said, "We look like Skittles." ✖✖✖
